The April 13 meeting came hours after Palestinian leaders warned that Jews visiting the Temple Mount compound during the upcoming Passover festival would inflame tensions. In an incident last week, a Jewish couple was secretly married while on a visit to the Temple Mount, leading several Israeli politicians to warn that the move threatened to ignite new violence around the holy site. ■

Israeli youths tend to be right-wing, survey shows

JTA, JERUSALEM

American young people are rallying behind Jewish socialist Bernie Sanders. Their Israeli counterparts look more likely to back Jewish nationalist Naftali Bennett.

A poll of Jewish-Israeli teens released last week by Israel Hayom, the free Israeli right-wing daily, portrays a generation that's staunchly nationalist, pessimistic on peace and, in part, dismissive of Arab-Israeli civil liberties.

According to the poll of 11th and 12 graders, 59 per cent of Jewish-Israeli youths call themselves right-wing. Twenty-three per cent self-define as centrist, while only 13 per cent are left-wing. Eighty-two per cent say there's little to no chance of reaching a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

A majority says the Israel Defence Forces is the world's most moral army. Nearly two-thirds agree with the traditional Israeli saying, "It is good to die for our land."

Those numbers skew a bit to the right of Israeli Jews in general. The 2015 Israel Democracy Index, a yearly survey put out by the Israel Democracy Institute (IDI), finds that Israeli Jews self-define as 49 per cent right, 27 per cent centrist and about 16 per cent left. Three-quarters, according to another IDI survey from March, doubt the chances for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Such a generational shift reflects recent Israeli history. Israeli 18-year-olds, born in 1998, went through nursery school during a bloody intifadah and had seen three wars in Gaza, and one in Lebanon, before graduating high school. Meanwhile, they've experienced repeated waves of terror and watched three rounds of failed peace talks.

Unlike their parents and grandparents, they can't remember the 1980s, when ordinary Israelis and Palestinians had far more frequent contact, or the 1990s, when optimism about peace was widespread. They have no personal memory of Yitzhak Rabin, his assassination as prime minister, the incitement leading up to it or the Israeli social rifts that followed.

The Israel Hayom survey suggests young Israeli Jews have right-wing views on Arabs too. Nearly half say Israeli Arabs shouldn't be allowed to vote or run for Knesset. Sixty per cent say the soldier who shot dead a wounded Palestinian attacker in Hebron shouldn't be put to trial.

In that sense, the youths agree with their elders. According to the 2015 IDI survey, Israeli Jews in general favour giving Jews more voting rights than Arabs. Sixty per cent say only those who swear a loyalty oath to Israel and perform national service should be allowed to vote and run for Knesset – a requirement that would exclude most Israeli Arabs. Most Israeli Jews believe a Jewish majority should be required to make decisions regarding peace, security, economics, governance or society. Most oppose including Arab parties in the governing coalition.

Israel Hayom's Boaz Bismuth sees his newspaper's survey as mostly good news. "So what does all this say? That at the end of the day, our youths are similar to their parents," he writes. "In our case, this is actually heartening: our youths, most of all, are patriots. We have someone to rely on."

Israeli Hayom put the best spin on one statistic: that 11 per cent of Israeli youths don't see their future in Israel. The Israel Hayom article called that finding, among others, as "very patriotic." And while the relatively low number tracks with data suggesting that emigration rates have been declining in the last 20 years, fears that young people will depart for greener economic pastures has prompted much hand-wringing over the years; in 2011, the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption ran a controversial series of TV ads warning Israelis against moving abroad. ■

Opposition parties join forces to stop PM's re-election

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Opposition lawmakers have joined forces to pass a bill that would limit Israeli prime ministers to no more than two terms in office.

If signed into law, the legislation would set a de facto term limit for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who is currently serving his fourth term as head of state.

The bill was first proposed by Zionist Union MK Merav Michaeli in 2014, but was thwarted by the Likud leadership in the last Knesset.

The legislation, which seeks to "prevent the degeneration and detachment" of Israel's leaders, was re-submitted March 30 to the Knesset for a preliminary vote.

Michaeli's bill argues that a two-term limit produces a stable government and encourages serving prime ministers to maintain a strong coalition by eliminating the option of rushing to new elections.

"Democracy is not a monarchy, and it is vital to not create long years of rule by a single person," the bill reads.

Zionist Union head Isaac Herzog, Yesh Atid chairman Yair Lapid, Yisrael Beytenu chairman Avigdor Liberman and Joint (Arab) List chairman Ayman Odeh have joined forces in an effort to pass the bill into law, Channel 2 reported on April 17.

The lawmakers also are seeking to have Netanyahu barred from the plenum vote, because the legislation would affect him personally.

Though the bill would limit a prime minister's term, it would not impose a limit on a party's ability to maintain power over multiple consecutive terms.

In a statement on Sunday, Likud party members accused the right-wing Liberman of capitulating to a left-wing agenda, and accused him of "attempting to topple" the ruling Netanyahu government.

In 2015, Netanyahu entered his third consecutive term in office. He previously served as prime minister between 1996 and 1999. ■

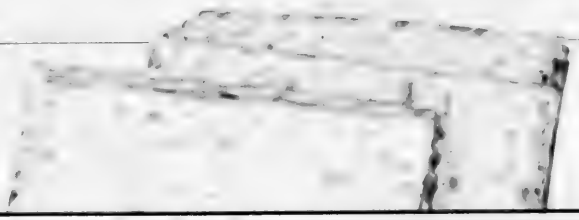
PASSOVER FOOD



Mediterranean specialties

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Most of us have favourites that we rely on every Passover. I, too, have to cook and bake some of the same things every year, and I love doing so because I know it will please my family and guests.

I have been serving the same brisket recipe for the past decade or so because everyone arrives looking forward to it. But I also accompany it with another dish.

I like to pay homage to other Jewish cuisines. The Cornish hen recipe takes its lead from Moroccan cuisine with its emphasis on paprika, coriander, ginger and garlic. The fig charoset is somewhat sweet and sour, the perfect mortar for your seder plate. And the Candied Citrus Salad with Mint and Ginger is a sweet antidote to the richness of the main meal.

Candied citrus salad with mint and ginger

If you prefer, you can slice the oranges instead of sectioning them and cook them in the sugar syrup to remove the bitterness from the rind.

- ❑ 4 large navel oranges
- ❑ 1 large pink grapefruit
- ❑ 3/4 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup chopped crystallized or candied ginger
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint

Using a sharp knife, cut away the peel from the oranges, removing all of the bitter white pith. Working over a bowl to catch the juices, cut the oranges in between the membranes to release the orange sections into the bowl. Repeat with the grapefruit.

Transfer all of the segments to a serving bowl, reserving the juices for another use.

In a small bowl, stir together the sugar and 1/4 cup of water. Cook over medium to medium-high heat, without stirring, until the sugar is syrupy and the bubbles have thickened but the mixture has not yet caramelized, about 5 minutes. Immediately pour over the citrus. Let cool at room temperature. Stir in the ginger and the mint. Serve at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

- 1/4 cup kosher for Passover apple cider vinegar
- 1/4 cup granulated sugar
- 1/4 cup white wine
- 1/4 cup diced onion
- 1 apple, peeled, cored and diced
- 1 cup diced dried figs
- 1/4 cup diced pitted dates
- 1/4 cup chopped roasted pistachio
- 1/4 cup chopped dried apricots
- pinch ground cinnamon
- pinch ground cardamom

Put the vinegar, sugar and wine into a small saucepan and cook over moderate heat, stirring until the sugar dissolves. Add the onions and apple and cook until the onions are translucent, about 15 minutes.

Remove the pan from the heat, then stir in the figs, dates, pistachios, dried apricots and ground spices. Set aside to let cool before serving. Makes about 1-1/2 cups.

Honey glazed cornish hens with matzah stuffing

It may seem as though the matzah stuffing is too dry, but please don't be tempted to add more stock. Since the stuffing is cooked under the Cornish hens, the natural juices from the birds moisten it further. I do urge you to line your pan with parchment or aluminum foil, or the birds and the stuffing will be difficult to transfer to a serving platter or individual plates.

- 2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- 8 oz. chopped button mushrooms
- 1 onion, chopped
- 1 carrot, diced
- 1 rib celery, diced
- 3 large cloves garlic, minced
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 1/2 tsp. pepper
- 6 sheets matzah, broken into 1-inch
- pieces
- 1 cup chicken broth (or a little more)
- 1/4 cup chopped fresh cilantro

Cornish hens:

- Cornish hens (each about 1-1/4 lb)
- 1/2 cup honey
- 1 tsp. paprika
- 1 tsp. ground coriander
- 1tsp. lemon juice
- 1/2 tsp. ground ginger
- 1/4 tsp. cinnamon
- 1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper

Heat the oil in a heavy large skillet set over medium heat. Add the mushrooms; cook, stirring, for 10 minutes. Add the onion, celery, garlic, salt and pepper. Cook, stirring occasionally, until the vegetables are soft and beginning to brown, about 15 minutes. Stir in the matzah. Pour the chicken stock over. Simmer until most of the matzah is softened and the broth has been absorbed, about 10 minutes. Stir in the cilantro. Don't worry if some of the matzah is just barely soft. The juices from the Cornish hens will further soften it.

Cut the wing tips from the hens. Cut through the backbones and then through the breastbone to divide each hen in half; trim excess fat and skin. Evenly space 8 mounds of the matzah on an aluminum foil-lined rimmed baking sheet. Cover each mound with a hen half, cut side down.

In a small bowl, stir together the honey, paprika, coriander, ginger, lemon juice, cinnamon and pepper. Brush evenly over the hens. Bake in a preheated 375-degree oven until browned, the juices run clear when the hens are pierced with a fork and a meat thermometer registers 185, 40 to 45 minutes. Makes 8 servings. ■

Light and easy desserts for Pesach

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Whether it's at home with family and friends, at a hotel or resort, or taking part in a communal seder, it is estimated that more than 75 to 80 per cent of Jews participate in a Passover seder.

The seder is the focal point of the holiday, but that doesn't mean we must eat to the point of being so overstuffed we can barely move from the table.

Luscious lemon ice cream

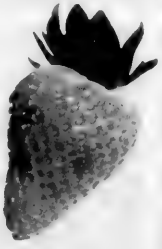
This is a low carb, low fat recipe by Nechama Cohen and is diabetic friendly.

- ❑ 1 (4-oz.) container light whipped topping
- ❑ 4 egg whites
- ❑ 2 eggs, separated
- ❑ sugar substitute equal to 1 cup sugar, divided
- ❑ 1/4 cup lemon juice

Beat whipped topping until stiff. In a separate bowl, beat egg whites together with half of sugar substitute. In another bowl, beat egg yolks with other half of sugar substitute. When thick, fold in lemon juice. Fold all 3 mixtures together until well-blended. Freeze.

Pistachio variation: For a delectable pistachio-flavoured ice cream, omit the lemon juice and add 1 tsp. almond extract, cup chopped pistachios and 2-3 drops of green food colouring.

Coffee variation: Omit lemon juice and add 2 tbsp. instant coffee, dissolved with a few drops of boiling water and 1 tsp. vanilla extract. Makes 8 servings.



Strawberry-basil granita

- ❑ 3/4 cup sugar
- ❑ 8 large basil leaves, torn, plus 6 sprigs, for garnish
- ❑ 1 lb. fresh strawberries, hulled and quartered

Heat the sugar with 1 cup of water in a medium saucepan over medium heat, stirring occasionally, until the sugar dissolves. Remove from the heat, add the basil and let steep until the syrup cools to room temperature. Discard the basil.

Purée the strawberries in a food processor. Add the cooled basil syrup, pulse until combined, then pour the mixture into a large baking dish.

Freeze until the mixture begins to harden around the edges, about 30 minutes. Stir with a fork, breaking up some of the pieces, then return dish to the freezer for 2 hours, scraping the surface with a fork every 20 minutes to create a flaky texture.

Transfer the granita to a covered container and freeze for 20 minutes more, or until ready to serve. To serve, divide among 6 serving cups and garnish each with a sprig of basil. ■

A riff on gefilte fish... beyond the tried and true

BEVERLY LEVITT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Gefilte fish was popular with Jews on Shabbat because the deboned delicacy fit into the talmudic prohibition of not working on the Sabbath to remove parts of food that were inedible, i.e., separating the fishy bones from the flesh. So ground fish was combined with eggs, onions, matzah meal and spices and poached, producing a lovely or murky gelatinous substance and served cold with an overdone carrot and some breathless horseradish.

New York chef Jeff Nathan, co-owner of Abigael's in Manhattan, likes to mould it into a loaf, dress it up with vegetables, and slice it by request.

Chef Ido Shapira of Tel Aviv carefully removes the bones of a delicate whitefish, leaving the head and tail intact, fills it with a flaked fillet and a myriad of compatible components, and then gently poaches it.

The sophisticated chef got his love of experimenting from his grandmother, who immigrated to Israel from Russia and grew up in an aristocratic family, eating exotic food that wasn't part of the Israeli table.

"Instead of plain gefilte fish, she took a beautiful whole fish, and stuffed it with the gefilte or stuffed fish. To serve, she wrapped it with rosemary branches. She learned this recipe from her mother, so that makes it about 100 years old," Shapira said.

Although he accessorizes the dish with the traditional horseradish, he also creates a riff on the root by welcoming another root to the Passover table, the Japanese horseradish, wasabi. But by the time Shapira gets through with it, it bears little resemblance to the fiery green paste that is quite capable of burning our mouths when we dip our sushi into it. As a further riff on the whitefish, pike and carp of our Passover staple, he offers a delicate, melt in your mouth salmon cake.

So, this Passover, we'll be staving off our hunger with gefilte fish, of one sort or another.

Salmon cakes

From Ido Shapira, cooking teacher and chefowner of Cutlet Catering, Tel Aviv, Israel. Makes 24 cakes

- ❑ 1 lb. wild salmon filet
- ❑ 1/4 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 1/2 cup water or fish stock
- ❑ 1/4 cup shallots, chopped
- ❑ 1 egg
- ❑ 1 tsp. kosher salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. cracked red peppercorns
- ❑ oil for frying

Mix matzah meal with water or stock; set aside for at least 1/2 hour.

Heat oven to 300. Place filet in oven, skin side down. Bake for 7 to 8 minutes, until inside is just slightly pink. Remove from oven. Cool 15 minutes.

With a fork, gently flake the fish into a shallow bowl. Add matzah meal mixture, shallots, egg, salt and pepper.

Over medium heat, pour oil into heavy skillet to 1/4 in. up the sides. Scoop up fish mixture with a tablespoon; carefully drop into the hot oil, patting it down with back of the spoon to make small delicate fish cakes. Do not crowd the pan. Fry on both sides until golden, about 2 minutes each.

Stuffed gefilte fish

From Ido Shapira, cooking teacher and chefowner of Cutlet Catering, Tel Aviv, Israel

Ask your fish salesperson to bone the whitefish.

- ❑ 1-2 lb. whole whitefish, boned, but with head and tail intact
- ❑ 12 cups poaching liquid

For stuffing:

- ❑ 1/2 lb. whitefish filet, cut into chunks
- ❑ 1/3 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 1/2 cup cold poaching liquid
- ❑ oil for frying
- ❑ 1cup coarsely chopped onions
- ❑ 1 egg yolk
- ❑ 1 tsp. light brown sugar
- ❑ 1 tbsp. chopped chives
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

For stuffing:

Soak matzah meal in cold poaching liquid.

Sauté onions in oil until transparent. Place in refrigerator to cool.

Place fish chunks, onion, egg yolk, sugar, matzah meal, salt, pepper and chives into bowl of food processor. Pulse until mixture is thoroughly combined and has a smooth texture.

Stuff fish with the mixture. Tie fish with kitchen string so that it remains intact while cooking. Place fish in cold poaching medium. Bring water to just below simmer; cook for 25 minutes. Turn off fire; leave fish in poaching medium. Place whole pot in ice bath. Remove to platter.

To serve: place fish on serving tray atop rosemary. Italian parsley and lemon wedges. Garnish with white and purple (beet-flavoured) horseradish. Makes 12 servings. ■

Chicken recipes for after the seder

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The other day I started checking out recipes to see what I'll prepare for my family during Passover. I'm counting on serving leftovers from the seder for as long as they last.

We have the second seder at my sister's house and I usually leave there laden with containers of potatoes, tzimmes, brisket and plenty of desserts, so I try to prepare simple fare for the rest of the week. I know I can't miss with baked or roasted chicken.

I do try to balance the heavy food from the seders with lighter fare. I recently tried a couple of quick and easy chicken recipes that could be made during Passover from two classic cookbooks: Simply Heart Smart Cooking by Bonnie Stern (Random House, Toronto, 1994) and Meal Leani Yumm! by Norene Gilletz (Gourmania Inc., 1994).

The title of Gilletz's book changed to Healthy Helpings, when it was published by Whitecap Books in 2008.

Both Stern and Gilletz were among the first Canadian authors to write cookbooks geared to healthy eating. And with so many people following different dietary regimes, these chicken recipes will work for low fat, low carb and paleo diets.

Stern pairs a grilled cilantro chicken recipe with Pad Thai, an Asian noodle dish that can't be used on Pesach. However, when I served this chicken dish with steamed vegetables and mashed potatoes, it was a hit with the family. In fact, there were no leftovers.

Grilled cilantro chicken

From Simply Heart Smart Cooking by Bonnie Stern

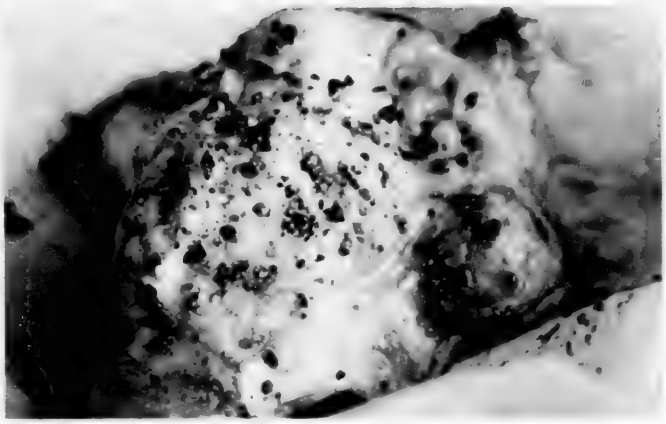
- ❑ 4 cloves garlic
- ❑ 2 shallots or 1 small onion
- ❑ 1 cup fresh cilantro
- ❑ 2 tbsp. Passover imitation soy sauce
- ❑ 1/4 cup lime juice
- ❑ pepper to taste
- ❑ 6 boneless, skinless single chicken breasts

Combine the garlic, shallots or onions, cilantro, "soy" sauce and pepper in a food processor and blend until smooth. Pour into a shallow dish. Add chicken pieces. Turn to coat evenly with the marinade. Marinate in the refrigerator a few hours or overnight.

Preheat the broiler. Cook the chicken five to six minutes per side or until the outside is brown and the chicken is no longer pink inside. Baste with the marinade during cooking. Discard any leftover marinade. Makes 6 servings.

Gilletz's recipe is a single chicken portion, baked with vegetables in a foil pouch, and several portions can be made at one time. The julienned veggies really add nice colour (not that my husband would notice the presentation), but he did enjoy the dish.



Lemon dill chicken and vegetables in a pouch

From Meal Leani Yumm! or Healthy Helpings by Norene Gilletz

- ❑ 1 boneless chicken breast, about 1/4 pound
- ❑ salt to taste
- ❑ ground pepper to taste
- ❑ paprika to taste
- ❑ 1 tsp. fresh dill, minced
- ❑ 1/2 to 1 tsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 to 2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ 1/3 cup julienned red and yellow peppers and zucchini or cauliflower or broccoli florets.

Place chicken in a bowl and sprinkle with seasonings. Rub chicken with dill, oil and lemon juice. Let chicken marinate in seasonings for half an hour at room temperature or cover and refrigerate up to 24 hours.

Preheat oven to 400. Cut a large square of foil. Place marinated chicken in the foil. Drizzle with marinade and top with vegetables. Seal package by crimping the edges of the foil. Bake 20 to 25 minutes.

To serve, place the pouch on a serving plate and cut it open at the table. ■

Jewish Life

The doc will chronicle Kensington Market's vibrant history.

Film to look at changing Kensington Market

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

By the time Stuart Clarfield was born in 1963, Toronto's Jewish community had largely migrated from downtown to the city's northern suburbs.

Still, Clarfield was raised on stories of Kensington Market, the neighbourhood southwest of College Street and Spadina Avenue.

This was where his great-grandfather first arrived from Poland around 1910 and began to build a life, as well as where Clarfield's mother was born.

"I'd always heard living in the market described as this mythological experience," Clarfield said.

A filmmaker for the past 25 years, Clarfield has decided to capture the neighbourhood's vibrant history and evolving landscape in a documentary called Kensington Market: The First 150 Years.

The film, which Clarfield is producing and directing through his Toronto documentary company, The Mission Media Company Inc., will chronicle the stories of the diverse communities that have made the market their home for nearly two centuries.

It will also examine the current forces of urban development poised to have an impact on the neighbourhood's future.

> "I'd always heard living in the market described as this mythological experience.

Mission Media is in the process of gathering public support for the project through a crowdfunding campaign on the online platform Indiegogo.

With an initial fundraising goal of $12,000, they're seeking to raise money for the first phase of production, and are also soliciting people's personal stories about the market through an ongoing social media campaign.

"The market has often been a home to people who weren't welcome elsewhere," Clarfield said, noting that the film will trace the area's development from the early 19th century to the present.

In 1815, British landowner George Taylor Denison purchased the undeveloped land encompassing what is now Kensington Market.

In the 1850s, the Denison estate was subdivided and parcelled into individual plots, and by the 1880s, houses were being built there for Irish and Scottish immigrant labourers settling in Toronto.

In the early 20th century, Kensington was flooded with Jewish immigrants fleeing eastern Europe, and the area, then one of the city's poorer neighbourhoods, became known for its densely packed houses and what was known as the "Jewish Market," where Jewish merchants sold goods and worked largely as tailors, furriers and bakers.

By the 1920s and '30s, Kensington Market and its surrounding area were home to roughly 60,000 Jews and about 30 synagogues.

Clarfield's great-grandfather was one of the founders of one of the area's now defunct shuls: having come from Ostrovia, Poland, he helped to establish the Ostrovtzer Congregation, the site of which is now the Cecil Street Community Centre.

Clarfield said the film, which he hopes can one day be used as a teaching resource in Jewish day schools, will give Jewish children the chance to "see the early stages of the community and experience that missing link to their grandparents or great-grandparents."

He plans to work with the Ontario Jewish Archives to collect more historical information about Jewish Kensington.

After World War II, much of the Jewish population moved north, and in the 1950s, Portuguese immigrants from the Azores region began settling in the market, as well as waves of Caribbean and East Asian immigrants.

In the 1960s, many residents of Chinatown, then centred along Dundas Street between University Avenue and Bay Street, were evicted by the city for development purposes and relocated in and around the market.

Nowadays, Clarfield said, the market is home to dozens of vintage stores and artisan and specialty "foodie" shops and restaurants, as well as a growing marijuana industry.

In addition to featuring stories from the market's past and present inhabitants, Clarfield said the film will focus on city planning consultations that are underway, and proposed developments.

"As rents go up, real estate value changes, and the monolith condo industry continues to grow... We're asking, What is the market going to be?... As filmmakers, we're not here to advocate one position over another, but to make people conscious of what's happening."

The film is slated for release in the fall of 2016 or the spring of 2017.

People can share personal stories of the market at: kensington150@gmail.com. ■

The struggle to blend Orthodoxy and modernity

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Orthodox religions, including Orthodox Judaism, believe that a religion's core values are timeless and immutable. In the 20th and 21st centuries in the western world, on the other hand, we often feel that our values surpass those of our forefathers, believing we have more respect for rights, freedoms and civil liberties, and for minorities, women and strangers in society. While traditional Judaism emphasizes the importance of the group, modernity emphasizes the status of the individual.

Thus, creating a Judaism that's both Orthodox and modern is a challenge. Torah and Western Thought: Intellectual Portraits of Orthodoxy and Modernity is a collection of intellectual biographies of 20th-century Orthodox Jewish leaders who have tried to bring together these two value systems. Many of the thinkers discussed in the book, most of the essay authors, and all three editors have taught at some point at Yeshiva University. In that sense, the book is, at least in part, an attempt to portray Yeshiva University as being in the forefront of the struggle to blend Torah and modern thought.

All the essays are well written, providing useful examples of how each thinker dealt with the modernity/tradition problem. They manage to avoid being "lives of the saints" that applaud and admire without analyzing or evaluating.

Yael Unterman's piece on Prof. Nehama Leibowitz, the famous Israeli scholar and teacher of Bible who died in 1997, may have even gone too far in the opposite direction. Unterman claims that Leibowitz's work "may be scrutinized for its lack of correspondence with the 21st-century zeitgeist, which is a notable obsession in western society with the self... Leibowitz's Torah, it can be argued, lags behind that of those contemporary teachers... who take on the search for meaning, wholeness and belonging."

Torah and Western Thought: Intellectual Portraits of Orthodoxy and Modernity, edited by Meir Soloveichik, Stuart Halpern and Shlomo Zuckier.

Maggid Books and Straus Center for Torah and Western Thought

As a student of Leibowitz myself, I still respect and teach her methodology, and I take issue with this assessment of her contemporary relevance. The skills that she brought to the close reading of texts should still be important, even to Jews who search for meaning, wholeness and belonging.

The subjects of the book include nine males, all Orthodox rabbis, and Leibowitz. In addition to deep Jewish education, almost all of them had extensive university education. (I count seven PhDs among them.) Two of the thinkers, Rabbi Abraham Kook and Rabbi Yehudah Amital, never studied in a university, yet still struggled meaningfully with modernity and tradition.

It must have been difficult to choose whom to include. Every scholar in the book was born between 1865 and 1933. This may explain why no Israeli-born thinkers are included, even though some of the most interesting approaches to Orthodoxy and modernity are now found in Israel. Before World War II, modern Orthodoxy hardly existed in Israel. The first two Ashkenazi chief rabbis of Israel, Rabbi Kook and Rabbi Isaac Herzog, had something to say about Orthodoxy and modernity and so are included in the book. Later holders of that office were not, perhaps because none of them contributed significantly to the discourse on this.

In discussing modern times, one of the editors, Rabbi Meir Soloveichik, argues that combining secular wisdom and Orthodoxy may have become more difficult in the last few decades. Until recently, he writes in a short introduction to the book, the university world believed "that the knowledge it safeguarded and transmitted was vital to the moral and spiritual survival of civilization; that faith and reason must go hand in hand; and that not only does religion enhance the pursuit of wisdom, but the fear of God is the very beginning of wisdom itself." Today this is hardly the case.

All 10 thinkers are Ashkenazi Jews, despite the fact that, as some scholars like Prof. Zvi Zohar have argued, Sephardi Jews often made significant, creative and less self-conscious contributions to the blending of modernity and Orthodoxy. Sephardi rabbis generally were not as concerned about distancing themselves from the liberal Jewish movements, and thus, Zohar and others argue, they innovated without fearing a backlash.

It is true that before World War II, Ashkenazim constituted around 90 per cent of world Jewry. But including Rabbi Ben-Zion Meir Hai Uziel, the first Sephardi chief rabbi of the State of Israel, or Rabbi Joseph Messas, who also lived and taught in Israel but was of North African origin, for example, would have provided balance.

A time line at the beginning of the book contains helpful geographical and chronological information. It highlights one interesting experience almost all of the subjects shared: they were immigrants, Jews who left continental Europe and moved to an English- or Hebrew-speaking country. The two exceptions are Rabbi Isadore Twersky, who was born and died in the United States, and Rabbi Norman Lamm, who was born in the United States and still lives there.

Immigrants know that values change when they come to a new place. Some immigrants reject those changes and continue to pine for the values of the old country. But most Jews who moved to North America, England or Israel, came to appreciate at least some of the values of their new home. Perhaps it makes sense that they would also be willing to consider that values could change over time, and that new ways of thinking about old issues might be required even among the Orthodox. ■

WHO GETS THE KIDS ON PASSOVER?

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

So who gets the kids for the first Seder if the parents are separated? To make it worse, who, on this Blessed Earth really wants to reach into his pocket (or parent's pockets) and dish out hard cold cash to some lawyer over a Seder, for heaven's sake?

I'm sure some Rabbi will probably answer that Pesach, like any other celebration, is just one more "challenge" to the Jewish spirit. That is frankly small comfort. However, a decent lawyer with a conscience will try and avoid court, call opposing counsel and invite him to Starbucks for a latte or an "original roast" at Tim Hortons. The two will review their clients' respective complaints. My fellow readers please feel free to email me the rest:

1. I can't do second night. My mother always does the first. This year she's invited 35,934 people. Our Mendel Jr. (aged 6) is the youngest and has been chosen to sing the Ma Nishtana. It will kill my mother if Mendel's not there. Besides... Imma makes a better brisket than your mother, with Dijon, not French.
2. You can't have the first night. Don't ruin Pesach for them. Your parents say Kiddush after schul, like around 10 P.M. Mendel's head will be in his soup plate, fast asleep, before the main course. They're too young. It's not fair. Torture yourself with your mother's bitter tzimes, not the children.
3. Will you pay the plane fare? My parents live in Windsor. Last year you had both nights at your parents in Forest Hill. So my parents should have them both nights this year. Of course, you do have option of paying to split the nights, but you pay the plane fare.
4. You can't have the first night. Your family doesn't know from religion. How do I know the food will be kosher for Pesach? The kids will end up in Gehenom.

And you thought that splitting the Red Sea was a miracle? But why does this happen? Why do families suffer, year after year? A time to celebrate freedom often ironically pressures families to tear themselves apart.

Some solutions?

1. Alternate the first and second Seders from year to year
2. Alternate both Seders from year to year
3. Give replacement days for the Seders or Seder
4. Invite the other parent to your Seder, as horrifying a thought as that may appear i.e. suspend the war for one or two nights for the sake of Pesach.

Unsavory-Solutions:

5. Split up the kids
6. Go with the kids to Bahrain on Pesach, the country with the fewest Jews in the world (36 at last count.)
7. Go to court and give me a large retainer cheque to obtain a Court order for one of the Solutions under numbers 1-4 (see above) since it costs more than its worth.

For both myself, the partners and associates of Garfin ZeidenbergLLP, we wish all our readers a Chag kasher v'samayach!

Book highlights Passover around the world

CAROLYN BLACKMAN
cblackman@thecjn.ca

In Passover Festival of Freedom, Montreal author Monique Polak reminds us to retell the story, year after year, of how our ancestors emerged from slavery to become free men and women.

Throughout the book, Polak, an author of 19 novels for young people and a teacher at Marianopolis College in Montreal, relates the story of Passover, talks about what the holiday means to her, and tells of how she spoke to dozens of people, including two Holocaust survivors, who talk about their stories.

Polak, whose mother, now 86, is a Holocaust survivor, said that growing up, most of what she learned about Judaism was related to the Holocaust, "but when I was asked to write this book about Passover, I agreed immediately... it was time to broaden my own understanding of Jewish history and religion."

After telling the Passover story, she talks about preparing for the holiday, the seder ceremony and traditional foods, and includes such recipes as charoset and chicken soup.

It's when she speaks to Benzion Younger, a 90-year old Holocaust survivor, and Liselotte Ivry, also a 90-year-old survivor, that we're reminded that the freedom to practise our religion is a great gift, and that we can endure and overcome the most challenging of circumstances.

Younger, the only one in his immediate family to survive, says he's not as religious as he was growing up, but remembers the first Passover after the war in the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp.

He felt happy and sad at the same time.

"That seder was extremely emotional. Everyone was singing and crying. I know I was depressed, but at the same time I felt 'I'm in a family... I'm back to the religious family I grew up with.'"

For Ivry, Passover is a time to celebrate her own survival, and the survival of the Jewish People.

She says she cherishes the Passovers of her youth, "and by celebrating [now], we remind ourselves what it means to be Jews. If we give up our customs, then nothing was worth surviving for."

Polak also teaches us that as we celebrate Passover in North America, people the world over, including Israel, the Netherlands, China, Nepal, Italy, Ethiopia and Iraq are celebrating with their own customs.

With numerous sidebars, photographs, recipes, drawings and short facts, the book Passover Festival of Freedom is bound to teach youngsters and adults alike how important it is to celebrate the holiday in their own way. ■

Guitarist uses global influences to make his own sound

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

French-Algerian acoustic guitarist Pierre Bensusan has absorbed music from around the world to create his own mesmerizing and sometimes otherworldly sound. You can hear classical, folk, Celtic, eastern European, jazz, Brazilian, North African and even bluegrass music in his melodies that range from delicate to rollicking.

A master guitarist, he's also an entertaining singer with a pleasant voice, who scats and performs wordless vocalizations, called nigunim, in the Jewish tradition.

Ironically, Bensusan had no interest in playing guitar when his father presented him with one, after selling his piano. The guitar "grew on me," he recalled. Unenthusiastic about formal studies – he'd quit piano lessons – he began teaching himself guitar at the age of 11.

After touring the world for 42 years as a concert performer, he maintains that working on an instrument continues to be endless. He spoke about his aim as a guitarist, to almost bring his consciousness into his fingers.

Pierre Bensusan

"You need to give your fingers the memory of where they can go along the fretboard. Then, in situations, they will have to go there without you expressing an intention or desire to hear something. That's the goal," he said.

Bensusan was born to a Jewish family in Oran, Algeria, in 1957, during the war that led to the country gaining its independence from France. Oran was safe at the beginning of the war, but by 1960 violence had swept the city. The apartment building his family lived in was bombed, and he remembers seeing the ceiling collapsing in front of him one afternoon. In 1962, his family "left Algeria for good, to move to mainland France, along with one million French people and Jews," he said.

His great-grandmother, who was born in Spanish Morocco, spoke Arabic, Spanish and Ladino. "My mother knew some Ladino lullabies that she would sing to me," Bensusan said. "Were they essential influences? Probably not, but 58 years later I still remember them and could sing them, so… They have been transformed into the music I express."

Speaking about his myriad influences, including North African music, he said he's doing what Jewish artists in the Diaspora have always done, borrowing from other cultures.

"To use Oriental flavours and mix them with something else would be a parallel to what Jewish people have been doing for the last 2,000 years, to mix themselves with different cultures to make something of their own," said Bensusan, speaking on the telephone from his home in Chateau Thierry, a village outside Paris. "They have developed something very rich. So I think that has been something that has been given to me."

Bensusan has recorded 15 albums and sold a half million records of mainly original songs. They're complex musically, sometimes with lyrics penned by his wife, Doratea.

Bensusan is touring North America this spring and stopping in Toronto for a rare appearance. He'll be playing and singing selections from his latest CD, Encore, a retrospective collection that won in the Live Performance Award category at the 2014 international Independent Music Awards.

On tour, he's in the zone and relaxed enough to let go onstage, he said. "I try to never play the same thing twice. I change a few things around and go into different improvisations." ■

Bensusan performs at Saint Stephen-in-the-Fields Church, 103 Bellevue Ave., Toronto, on May 7 at 8 p.m. For tickets, $35 plus processing fee, visit http://tinyurl.com/pierre2016. For more information about Bensusan, visit www.pierrebensusan.com.

Concert to benefit kids with psychological difficulties

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

An upcoming concert at Toronto's Koerner Hall in support of the Psychology Foundation of Canada, which develops programs to help children become confident and productive adults, was born in the shadow of Robin Williams' suicide in August 2014.

Around that time, Andrea Freedman Iscoe, a singer who had organized a Massey Hall concert in support of the SOS Children's Villages, was having lunch with a friend, Karen Katchen, a psychologist on the foundation's board of trustees. Freedman Iscoe remembers talking about how sad she was at the beloved comedian/actor's passing and she mentioned to Katchen that she wanted to put on another concert, but this time at Toronto's Koerner Hall.

"I said, 'I want to do it for kids,'" Freedman Iscoe recalled. "So she said, 'What about the psychology foundation and kids' mental health?' and it just all clicked."

Excited by the prospect of organizing the concert, Freedman Iscoe met with the foundation's board and showed them the program and pictures from the November 2010 Massey Hall event, which featured singers of all ages, who, like herself, had always dreamed of performing on a world-class stage.

When she began organizing A Night at Massey, Freedman Iscoe recalled that she got some less than encouraging responses. "Everybody thought I was crazy when I said I would rent Massey Hall and was putting on a concert. I had people hang up the phone on me," she said.

But she pulled it off, and the funds raised by the concert supported the Canadian children's village in Namibia for a year.

After getting the go-ahead from the psychology foundation's board, Freedman Iscoe secured her dream venue, Koerner Hall, which is known for its excellent acoustics.

The May 6 event, similar to her Massey Hall project, will showcase talented local youths and adults, some performing on a world-class stage for the first time. The show is built around hits from the 1950s, '60s and '70s and will be hosted by Duff Roman, a former DJ on CHUM-AM radio. The lineup also includes appearances by guest artists guitarist Liona Boyd; Little Ceasar and the Consuls, a 1960s Canadian rock band; and the Dylan Tree, a group that performs the music of Bob Dylan.

Theadora Draper

Ruth Rumack

"It's like Canada's Got Talent. You have the guest artists to make it all feel exciting, but really it's about people singing their hearts out because they want recognition," Freedman Iscoe said.

Altogether 92 performers, including two choirs, will appear at Koerner Hall, participating in a total of 24 acts.

The show features several Jewish singers, among them Freedman Iscoe, Sarah Dylan (not a member of the Dylan Tree), who also sang at the Massey Hall event, baritone Manny Veinish, soprano Joni Miller, Jessica Faith, Sophie Medad and sisters Naomi and Ruth Rumack, who will sing a duet. The evening's Jewish performers also include acoustic guitarist Theadora Draper, 14, an aspiring musician, actor and filmmaker who's also a Grade 10 film major at the Claude Watson School for the Arts at Earl Haig Secondary School. Theadora is a member of an all-girl rock band.

The money raised by the concert will go toward the psychology foundation's programs, including several under the category Kids Have Stress Too, aimed at children and young people aged 2-1/2 to 15. The programs are offered free of charge, except for fees for materials, by the national not-for-profit foundation. They are available to teachers and parents through schools and public health departments.

"Right across the country, 25,000 Grade 4, 5 and 6 teachers have our stress lessons program, so that they can work with the kids in their care," said the foundation's executive director, Judy Hills. The foundation is about mental health promotion and prevention, she said, "and giving people the skills so that they can handle all the ups and downs of life." ■

ARTS & CULTURE

Discover your cultural heritage in Poland

Evelyn Tauben

With Purim, we entered the season of memory, remembering Mordechai and Esther's triumph in saving their people. This week, we will remember the Exodus from Egypt. We will remember the destruction of the Holocaust on Yom Hashoah. One week later, we will remember the establishment of the State of Israel followed by the day of memory for Israel's fallen soldiers. We remember victory and devastation.

When do we remember the communities that birthed modern Jewish thought and culture? When do we remember 200-year old Jewish artistic traditions? When do we remember the streets where our grandparents played? When do we remember the synagogues where they prayed? A people steeped in remembering have been forgetting where we come from. Will we allow our heinous adversaries to erase the memory of how Jews lived, transplanting it with a fixation on how Jews died?

A powerful antidote to this erosion of our shared story is a journey into memory. For my family, that journey takes us to Poland. After four trips to Poland in not as many years, I strongly believe that every Jew should visit Poland, especially those of us with Polish roots, which is roughly 70 per cent of those reading this article. Now is an unmatched time to go there and balance the standard itinerary to sites of destruction with cultural exploration.

The largest Jewish culture festival in the world is in Krakow. Marking its 25th anniversary last summer, the festival animates the once and present Jewish neighbourhood of Kazimierz, hosting nightly concerts in the impressive 19th century Tempel Synagogue, adjacent to the modern Krakow JCC.

The nearby Galicia Jewish Museum is now planning an expansion after a decade of first-rate programming. My time at the Jewish Culture Festival was one of the most eye-opening, uplifting experiences of my life, contradicting images of Poland circulating in Jewish consciousness as colourless, menacing, and devoid of Jewish life. There I encountered soul-searching Poles as well as fervent Polish-Jews connecting with their newfound identities.

The Polin Museum of the History of Polish Jews in Warsaw just won the European Museum of the Year award, cementing its place as a significant cultural destination. Housed in a breathtaking building, the museum has quickly become a focal point in recounting 1,000 years of Jewish life in Poland. While in Warsaw, don't miss exhibitions at the Jewish Historical Institute or the small but spunky Warsaw JCC. Around the corner, the "Risk Oy" label of a locally made clothing line features cheeky Jewish motifs on shirts.

Beyond the urban centres, there is much Jewish culture to discover. In many places, too numerous to list, synagogues have been restored as museums or converted into cultural centres, protecting the building and its history. In a town of 4,000, I visited Chmielnik's sophisticated synagogue museum with a bimah made of glass modelled on the original. Chmielnik is one of many locations hosting annual Jewish cultural festivities to connect to the Jewish heritage once prominent in the community.

While our fears regarding Poland are hard won and unfortunately the political climate of late has become more strident and xenophobic, I have not experienced anti-Semitism in Poland. I challenge myself to consider local oddities such as graffiti, Jewish-themed restaurants and collectible chassidic figurines with the complexity they demand. In times like these, the active, native Jewish community needs our continued presence.

An experienced guide can help you navigate the places where your family was from. Often the place retains a feeling of the time when they lived there. By exploring leisurely on foot with an open mind, you can get a sense of the environment that surrounded your family before, during and after the war. Eat good food, visit the galleries, notice the beauty and friendly people. Greet them (dzien dobry) and thank them (dziekuje) in Polish. And remember that your ancestors were Polish. Take them with you as you go out on your journey. ■

Amy Sky to release her first Hebrew-language album

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Amy Sky LINDA MARIE STELLA PHOTOGRAPHY

Award-winning singer-songwriter Amy Sky is set to release her debut Hebrew-language album, Twilight Rose, this May.

A prolific and multi-talented artist, Sky has written songs for herself and for dozens of other international recording stars, including Olivia Newton-John, Anne Murray, Reba McEntire, Diana Ross, Belinda Carlisle, and the rock band Heart.

Sky's powerful lyrics resonate globally, celebrating life's victories and challenges.

She will perform material from Twilight Rose, sing her beloved hits and share insights and stories from her own spiritual journey at Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto on May 19 at 8 p.m.

The concert, "Sky in the City: An Urban Jewish Concert Experience," is free and open to the public.

"When you hear my English-language music, percolating in the background are my Jewish roots and the community that I grew up in. When you grow up in a Jewish family, ideas of justice, brotherhood, sisterhood, community and unconditional love are part of a cultural context, so these kinds of themes came out in my music," Sky said.

Sky was inspired to create Twilight Rose in memory of her late mother, Sandy Shiner, who lived and breathed music.

"In addition to being a great mother, my mother was a hugely creative woman. She was a professor of creativity and a writer. I grew up steeped in the love of music and was never, ever, told to stop making noise. In her wisdom as a teacher of creativity, my mother knew that the secret to creativity was to let people make noise and a mess, and that's the environment I grew up in," Sky recalled.

Sky studied classical music from the age of four, and discovered her own singing voice when she was preparing for her bat mitzvah. She began writing songs around that time.

For a confirmation project at Holy Blossom Temple when she was 16, influenced by the compositions of Debbie Friedman, a singer-songwriter of Jewish religious music, Sky set a number of Hebrew prayers to music, with the intention to one day return to her roots and create more original melodies for the spiritual texts.

"Twilight Rose was my way of honouring my Jewish tradition, and also staying connected to my mom, because her Jewish life was so very important to her," Sky said.

The CD's songs include: Mi Shebeirach, Shalom Aleichem, Shalom Om, V'Shamru, Y'Did Nefesh and Sh'Ma/Barchu. Sky sings, plays the piano and harmonium, and composed or co-wrote eight of the 11 songs, drawing inspiration for the Hebrew text largely from the prayers of Kabbalat Shabbat.

"Prayers serve a lot of different purposes, and I just pulled the ones that felt good coming out of my mouth, that felt like they were expressing something I wanted to sing about," she said.

Sky's rendition of the Kaddish is the emotional centrepiece of the record. Lecha Dodi is about the Sabbath bride.

"Mi Chamocha holds a lot of meaning for me: it was about asking God to send healing energy down to earth when my mother was dying. That kind of prayer, asking God for healing, exists in every wisdom tradition, so it's very universal," Sky added.

The title of the album, Twilight Rose, derives from the song Erev Shel Shoshanim, which means Evening of Roses.

"It's a very well-known love song. It works on the musical level and has a beautiful text," Sky said.

Twilight Rose is "a fusion of east-meets-west influences, infused with rock and gospel. Sitar, dilruba, pennywhistle and harmonium, blend with a soft rock rhythm section and shimmering stacks of vocals to create an evocative soundscape," a promotional website for the album says.

Some 600 people are expected to attend the Sky in the City concert, sponsored by the Strom family, who are members of the congregation.

"We are excited to have Amy perform. She is a creative artist exploring different musical directions with regard to spiritual life. Her music is extremely beautiful and moving, and it's also thought-provoking. It will be a splendid event!" said Temple Sinai Cantor Charles Osborne.

Twilight Rose will be available for purchase at the concert and on iTunes in early May. ■

GUEST VOICE

Modern seder raises more than four questions

Marilyn Lazar

The Hebrew word seder means order. Order connotes predictability and control. Somewhere, for someone, the prospect of seders brings the comfort and confidence of knowing where and with whom one will sit each night, for so it has been, year after year. That's how it was for me once upon a simple time.

My parents taught me about the solidity of living, breathing order. I used to joke that if the queen ever invited my parents for Friday night dinner, they'd undoubtedly exclaim: "Oy – sorry, but our kids are coming for Shabbat."

The Pesach seders represented the ultimate for them in adherence to order. They maintained the Old World observance they had grown up with in Czechoslovakia. As Holocaust survivors, their wonder never ended at the gift of having plenty on the table and the miracle of family around it. The entire clan gathered – with not even a phone call necessary.

Wearing masks to represent the plagues makes the service more interactive. TANIA LEWIS PHOTO

By contrast, these days, the group email about the seders is the first harbinger of spring. One by one, everyone weighs in. Marriage, divorce, travel and new relationships enter the fray. As in dominoes, a single shift impacts not just our immediate group, but Jews the world over!

My parents' steadfastness instilled resilience during tumultuous times, but there are questions I never got to ask them. While Tevya might procure answers from the "Good Book," there really is no book to inform these contemporary dilemmas.

Each year, the holiday looms, lugging huge question marks in its wake. Will my children be with me on the first night or the second night? Is my significant other significant enough to include? Add a fifth question to the Ma Nishtanah: where will I feel most comfortable? This comfort has nothing to do with reclining against pillows as the Haggadah instructs, but is determined by where I will feel like an integral part of the proceedings and not like a politely included afterthought or a stray.

My situation is far from unique. Come to think of it, perhaps the vision of comfort I described above lives only in Hallmark greeting cards. Reconstituted family constellations are no longer an aberration.

It's no piece of flourless cake for my married daughter, for example. Both her parents and her in-laws are divorced. Each year, she and her husband can only please two of four parents with their presence at the seder table. Or, as my father used to say, "You can't dance at two chasenes with one tuches."

So last year, we did something a little different.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

GUEST VOICE

My son had completed an extensive renovation and was excited to pick up the mantle of seder-making in his sparkling new space. His father and I both attended, sharing a seder for the first time in 17 years. He attending with his wife, who, though undergoing cancer treatment, paid the usual attention to her spring wardrobe, as we traditionally do at seder time. Guests included gay and straight individuals and couples, family and friends from as far afield as Montreal and Washington, a convert to Judaism and a wonderfully respectful, curious Muslim who had done more homework than anyone else present.

This might sound far-fetched to you, but every seder table includes people in some degree of transition. Who should be included? Where does one draw the line? How does the new widow feel, sitting without a partner for the first time? What about the child with no parent, the empty-nesters, the out-of-town student far from home. What if one is struggling with health issues – contemporary versions of boils and pestilence? Last year, a friend of mine decided to forgo her usual festive extended cousins' gathering to sit quietly at her dying mother's table. Another friend, who is Orthodox, told me that the reading at her table is almost entirely in English in order to engage most listeners best.

Some seders follow the letter of the law very strictly in terms of start time and ritual, and participants have no difficulty raising kosot (wine glasses) and singing into the wee hours. Not so my daughter. She is pregnant, and although she feels wonderful, she needs her early bedtime more than usual to get through her usual workload. Out of consideration for her, her father-in-law is starting before the appearance of the third star on the second night, which this year falls on Shabbat.

> Lovingly held beliefs are not as important as love.

I would suggest that these questions are less about proper etiquette and enough seats than about common sense and compassion. From the evolving set of rules in my own magic hat, I pull the following: inclusion trumps perfection, acceptance trumps judgment, and flexibility trumps tenacity. Lovingly held beliefs are not as important as love.

Epilogue. My son moved out of that big house, symbolizing to me how transient are the venues that house our seders. What's important are the people who gather therein and how we treat each other. This year, I'm attending a seder being hosted by a woman who used to be married to my ex-husband's cousin. She is not related to me, or strictly speaking, to my children, although we adore her and her brisket. She was separated from her husband just last year and she attended my son's seder solo. This year, her ex is coming to her home as a guest. Her non-Jewish mother joined often with the utmost of grace. Sadly, my ex-husband's wife lost a valiant battle with cancer and did not survive to see another seder. This symbol of the transience of life is the most poignant message of all.

Next year? My fervent prayer is that my seder will be disrupted by the sound of an infant's healthy cry. The blessing of natural "order" should prevail, reminding me not to sweat the small stuff. ■

ASK ELLA

Passover challenges - some are harder than others

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

No one in our family is looking forward to the seders this year. Each of us wants to do our own thing at home instead of our usual large family seder.

This is our first seder without our mother, who died in November. The woman who held it all together for us, who made everything from scratch, who laughed while she served, who sang while she cooked, who organized and always looked beautiful at the table, is gone. If we could just snap our fingers and "pass over" this holiday, I think we all would. Even the grandchildren are feeling the terrible loss. I don't know how we are going to get through the seder this year. She was truly the matriarch of our family.

Heavy-Hearted Passover

Dear Heavy-Hearted Passover

Losing a parent is difficult to deal with at any time, but on holidays, the loss is intensified. You bring many grieving people into one room to go through the motions of what used to be a very happy and memorable experience, and all of a sudden you have been slammed into the unknown. No one feels like going through the motions. No one feels like celebrating.

Seders as you knew them will never be the same without your mother. You can't change that. What you can do, however, is capture and honour her memory.

Prepare dishes she would have made and then talk about how no one can make them like mom. Sing the songs that she would have sung. Laugh, cry, talk, tell stories, share memories and make her spirit part of your seder. This year's seder will be like no other before it. Allow yourselves to feel the loss and embrace the values and tradition she instilled in all of you.

Keeping her spirit alive is how she will continue to be with you forever. Each holiday, birthday and anniversary will be a time to remember. "Firsts" are the hardest, but you'll get through each one in your own way. Don't mask your feelings. Instead, accept the help of other family members and friends. This year, your mother will be with each and every one of you, firmly implanted in your hearts and minds.

Dear Ella,

Passover is here again and with it comes my yearly dilemma: my mother-in-law's gefilte fish. We're a fairly big group and everyone makes something to bring to the seder. My mother-in-law has been making the gefilte fish for years now. It tastes only slightly worse than it smells.

No one eats it. They all cover it with lots of horseradish and cut it up so it looks eaten, then the whole thing goes into the trash. It's a shame and a sin to waste food like this, but I don't know how to tell her. It also bothers me that it has become the Pesach joke around here, and I really feel it's time to put an end to it. But how?

No Fishing Please

Dear No Fishing Please

I'm sure your mother-in-law is good at cooking something other than gefilte fish. This year, have someone else take charge of the fish. Let her know that the fish has already been made, but you really need her to prepare the brisket, tzimmes or anything else you think would be enjoyed at the seder. I'm sure you really do need her help if you have a large group of people coming, so why not use her talents for something you could really appreciate. She will feel useful, and at the same time, you will get the help you need and the peace of mind of knowing you've done the best you can to solve this uncomfortable problem.

Your mother-in-law might be upset when you first break the news that someone else has already made the fish, but if you make a fuss about how much you need her to make something else, she will soon come to terms with her new task. It would be especially nice if you made a bit of a fuss over the new dish she prepares on seder night.

Chag Kasher v'Samayach. ■

Mamdouh Shoukri: president says York

YONI GOLDSTEIN
ygoldstein@thecjn.ca

After years of reports that Jewish students don't feel safe at York University because of anti-Zionist agitation on campus, and in the wake of a recent controversy over a mural in its student centre that some say promotes violence toward Israel, Mamdouh Shoukri, York's president since 2007, spoke to The CJN to discuss some of the issues at play.

Is York University a safe space for Jewish students?

Yes, absolutely. York University is a safe place for Jewish students and, for that matter, for all students irrespective of their religion, ethnic background or political opinions.

We at York are committed to creating an environment where all people feel welcome, valued and safe. York has a deep and rich history of supporting inclusion and ensuring that all members of our community enjoy a safe and nurturing environment. This is clearly reflected in our stated principles, policies and procedures, and in our many pioneering programs to promote inclusion and campus safety. York University and I, in my capacity as president, will never tolerate acts of anti-Semitism or any form of discrimination directed at any group or member of our community.

The relationship between York University and the Jewish community is, in some sense, unique. For a number of historic reasons, York University was embraced by the Jewish community in its early years. York, in turn, embraced and reflected the needs of that community. This legacy is reflected today in the vibrant academic activities of our Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies, our BA and MA programs in Jewish studies, the Jewish Teacher Education Program (one of a very few of its kind in North America), as well as in the engaged Jewish student organizations on campus such as Hillel. York also offers a number of services in support of Jewish life on campus.

Mamdouh Shoukri has been president of York University since 2007.

The Jewish community has heard from some Jewish students and organizations that claim they feel unsafe at York. At the same time, other Jewish students and student groups maintain they feel safe on campus. How do you account for this discrepancy?

I understand some of the reasons for this discrepancy. As with all universities, there are students and faculty at York who support the Palestinian causes and who are critical of policies of the State of Israel. Some of this criticism is part of a legitimate political dialogue, while part of it can be seen by some as a cover for anti-Semitic sentiment.

While the university, using its best academic and legal resources, is in a good position to protect and support academic freedom and freedom of expression, and to draw the line when it comes to hate or other forms of discrimination or intimidation, the emotional aspects of an issue may affect some students and can make them feel uncomfortable or unsafe. This is understandable, as many of our students are the first in their families to attend university, and for others this may be the first time they have experienced the diversity of opinions that is typical of a vibrant academic environment.

I should add that the mostly unfair targeting of York by several Jewish organizations and individuals – perhaps in their zeal to combat anti-Semitism, which I can understand – has had a negative effect on some of our young students and has contributed to making them feel worried and victimized.

That said, the university has a responsibility – and indeed, is actively committed – to working with those who feel unsafe to ensure their positive engagement and to support fully their transition into the academic environment. At the same time, the university should stand firm on any attempt to intimidate our students or to advocate hate.

Toronto businessman Paul Bronfman made waves recently when he announced he would pull his funding from York over the controversial mural in the student centre. What is your view on that decision? Are you concerned that other Jewish donors may follow suit?

I regret Mr. Bronfman's decision to withdraw the in-kind support his company provided to a few students in our Film Studies program. However, such decisions cannot affect the policies and procedures of a university. We remain grateful to our donors and supporters. We are not concerned nor do we see any evidence that our major donors are less willing to continue their support for York.

In your mind, should there be any limits on discussions about Israel and the Palestinians on campus? Or should a university campus be open to all ideas, even if they may make some people uncomfortable?

Academic freedom and freedom of speech are central to the mission of any university. In principle, these freedoms should always be protected, within the limitations of the law. As such, advocating hate or violence, which is a violation of the law, cannot be tolerated under any circumstances. It is my strong view, however, that while acting within the limits of the law, vigorous yet respectful dialogue and exchange of ideas can be deeply enriching to the academic life of an institution.

University committed to inclusion

I believe it is the responsibility of those with strong views on any debate to act in a way that does not demonize and threaten others or make others feel unsafe.
The university has a responsibility to promote and encourage this approach.

In Canada and in the United States, there has been broad discussion around what is often depicted as a struggle between the right to free speech on university campuses and the need to strengthen our efforts toward diversity and inclusion. It is important to recognize that these goals are not at odds. Free speech, diversity and inclusion are all efforts to reach the same objective. We need to be talking constructively and openly about all challenges to safe and inclusive environments, for all individuals and groups, whether those barriers are racism, sexism, homophobia or other forms of discrimination or intimidation. Indeed, the balance between freedom of expression and ensuring that all members of a community feel safe in sharing their views without intimidation is a subject worthy of discussion in a collegial environment.

These are the principles that should guide our approach to the debate about Israel and Palestine on campus. We have zero tolerance for anti-Semitism or other forms of racism, or the advocacy of hate and violence by any group or individual. We work very hard with all sides to promote constructive dialogue and debate. There are some successes, such as the work by the Mosaic Institute and the highly successful academic teachings by individuals such as Prof. Saeed Rahnema. In addition, an even-handed approach to the implementation of our policies has been instrumental in enhancing students' life on campus. However, it is understandable that there will be individuals who may feel challenged by some ideas. While the university community has a responsibility to acknowledge and address these concerns, I believe the experience of open dialogue and constructive discussion will help all to understand the nature of the university environment and to allow their own thoughts and arguments to evolve.

What is your take on the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel, and more specifically, on the efforts to promote BDS among York student government and faculty?

York University uses best practices in developing its policy on investment. These practices are built on advice from major investment consulting firms and require investment managers to take into consideration environmental, social and governance factors in their investment decisions. It does not recommend the use of "negative screening" or divesting from particular companies. This approach is considered best practice by international standards. So, at this moment, our policies, as approved by York's board of governors, do not support BDS or divestment.

Obviously, any community group has the right to request a policy change. In this regard, York University also has a clear policy and procedure to be followed by any group seeking policy changes. Some time ago, we established the York University advisory committee on responsible investing (YUACRI). This advisory committee comprises students, faculty and staff who meet for the purposes of investigating, producing and providing advice to the university that is constructive and feasible, and making any recommended enhancements to the responsible investing process. YUACRI has a process for members of the York community to bring forward recommendations with respect to the management of endowment investments. Ultimately, the board has the authority to make any changes.

> In Canada and in the United States, there has been broad discussion around what is often depicted as a struggle between the right to free speech on university campuses and the need to strengthen our efforts toward diversity and inclusion. It is important to recognize that these goals are not at odds.

What might the Jewish community do to lower the temperature of conversation surrounding York?

The tenor of conversation surrounding York is upsetting our entire York community. It is important that we work together in understanding and promoting the important role that universities play in seeking solutions for the challenges that are facing the world through informed opinions and respectful exchange. I hope that future students from the Jewish community might hear more about the incredible opportunity to join a vibrant Jewish academic and community life, and to be exposed to the full richness of diversity that York offers.

I also hope that some of the external organizations in their advocacy and promotion to protect the Jewish people, who suffered greatly in the past, will review their approach and appreciate the inadvertent damage they may cause to the future of our students and to what we hope will continue to be a positive relationship.

What sort of relationships does York have with Israeli universities and institutions?

York University enjoys relationships with a number of Israeli universities and institutions, including Bar-Ilan University, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv University, Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design, and Arava Institute of Environmental Studies. In addition to providing opportunities for research and faculty collaborations, signed agreements with these institutions have generated student exchange activity. Our Centre for Jewish Studies continues to be involved in and to support various forms of scholarly exchange.

The mural controversy: in your view, how has York managed this situation? Is there anything you could have done differently?

The controversy surrounding the mural is part of this broader conversation and suggests we have an opportunity to further foster an inclusive environment for all members of our very diverse community.

I believe it is the right of all students, professors, and in fact all Canadians, to express their opinions and to join together to advocate for changes they believe will improve the university and society in general. I believe, just as strongly, that an intelligent discussion requires that both sides listen, which is why we are reviewing our policies to promote that goal.

In terms of the mural, it is clear that the subject of the artwork is offensive to some individuals and groups, particularly some Jewish members of our community. I understand and respect these concerns. York University has requested and confirmed that the executive of the Student Centre, which is a separate and distinct legal entity from the university, will establish procedures for hearing and resolving complaints from students about their shared space.

The considered advice we received assures me that displaying the painting in question is not illegal, and as such I accept the right of the artist to share his political position using it. However, I would like to see Student Centre consider replacing it, not because it is illegal, but rather as a way to create an opportunity to explore a better framework for dialogue.

There has been some controversy over the makeup of York's new inclusion committee. Some people have complained that the committee features many anti-Israel and pro-BDS voices. What is your response to them? And how, in your mind, will the committee overcome the previously stated views of its members?

Inclusion is a broad campus issue, and therefore the membership of the President's Advisory Committee on Inclusion needs to reflect that breadth, and consider and provide advice on approaches to promoting inclusion broadly in order to ensure a safe campus environment for all. I have heard concerns from Jewish members of our community and was also aware of other student and faculty groups who have expressed the need for a greater focus on inclusion on campus.

To be clear, this committee was not formed as a result of any specific incident, but rather to bring together York scholars to advance our shared goals of strengthening York's commitment to building an inclusive and diverse campus through collegial dialogue that nurtures the respectful exchanges of ideas, and supports and prepares our graduates for success anywhere. The committee is an advisory body, not a decision-making body, whose mandate is to ensure that all voices are heard. Most certainly, the committee would not consider the BDS question, nor will it make recommendations to the board.

Let me reiterate that while concerns raised by some of our members regarding the mural contributed to my decision to establish an advisory committee on inclusion, the committee's focus will be on strengthening inclusivity for all members of York's vibrant and diverse community. ■

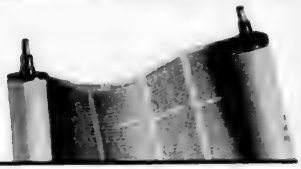
Pesach | Exodus 12:21-51; Numbers 28:19-25



Rabbi Ilan Acoca challenges us to respect each other's differences this Passover
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl says God redeems suddenly, but humans change slowly Rabbi Catharine Clark cautions against being certain we know who today's wicked Jews are

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The Torah teaches us (Exodus 13:8), "And you shall tell your son on that day, saying, 'It is because of this that God acted on my behalf when I left Egypt.'"

The Sefer Hachinuch (Mitzvah 21) says that we learn from this verse the mitzvah to recount the story of the Exodus on the 15th of Nisan to each person according to the way and language he understands.

I believe that there is a great lesson of education we could learn from the Sefer Hachinuch. God created every individual differently from one another. Therefore, when it comes to relating the story of the Exodus, or, as a matter of fact, to educate, we have to tailor the message accordingly, as King Solomon writes (Proverbs 22: 6), "Train a child according to his way; even when he grows old, he will not turn away from it."

The Talmud (Brachot 58b) teaches that "as the faces of people do not exactly resemble one another, so do their opinions do not exactly resemble each other." In other words, not everyone is supposed to fit the same mould.

The same goes for communities as well. The Jewish People had 12 tribes, and each one was different. As a Jewish nation, we have different communities with unique customs, and each community is responsible to observe and perpetuate it.

It is very easy to disqualify an opinion or a custom that is not in keeping with what we are used to, but it's much harder to understand it.

Our challenge is to respect each other's differences.

May God give us the wisdom, courage and appreciation to respect each other's dissimilarities and understand that we belong to the same God, same nation and same Torah.

Wishing you all a Chag Kasher v'Samayach! ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

A central aspect of Passover is the idea that our nascent nation departed Egypt in hipazon (anxious haste). Twice the Torah tells us God directed the Israelites to leave quickly: "Thus you shall eat [the lamb]; with... your sandals on your feet and your walking-stick in hand; you shall eat it in anxious-haste." (Exodus 12:11) "You shall not eat the Passover-offering with leaven; seven days you shall eat matzot, the bread of affliction, for you came out of Egypt in anxious-haste." (Deuteronomy 16:3).

Years ago, I waited for hours in a drizzling rain for the final stage of the Tour de France bicycle race. Then, in mere seconds, the racers zoomed past. Erica Brown has observed, "Sometimes important days in our lives take months, even years to prepare for and then pass by in the blink of an eye."

But the hasty exodus may have contributed to the challenges of the wilderness trek. God can redeem suddenly, but humans change slowly. The anxious-haste of the Exodus preceded 40 years in the wilderness.

In Thinking Fast and Slow, Daniel Kahneman identifies two modes of thought. One is fast, instinctive, emotional, stereotypical and subconscious. The other is slower, deliberative, logical, calculating and conscious. Together, they provide an effective balance for decision-making.

The term hipazon is found only one more time in the entire Bible. Describing a future redemption, Isaiah (52:12) states: "You will not leave in anxious-haste... for the Eternal will go before you." Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook taught that the messianic moment will not disrupt nature, but will grow as a gradual awakening from below (itaruta deletata). The Jewish People will return to their homeland, gain independence, restore field and city, defend themselves, develop centres of study and re-establish a spiritual centre.

On Passover, as we recall the hasty exit, we also proclaim our hope, "Next year in Jerusalem." ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

At the seder, the wicked child finds no meaning for herself in the proceedings and asks, "What is this service to you?" It is a bold and dismissive stance, worthy of the name wicked. Surely, no one would behave this way at seder. Who is this wicked child?

The Schechter Haggadah: Art, History, and Commentary, published by the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem in 2009, offers a number of possible answers to this question. The book includes illustrations from a wide collection of medieval and modern Haggadot. The depictions of the four children are fascinating. The wicked child always stands out.

Some of the depictions of the wicked child, such as a Roman centurion or knight of the Middle Ages, are what one would expect. Other representations of the wicked child are less obvious, even bewildering. In a 1941 Haggadah illustrated by Saul Raskin, the wicked son is portrayed as a Mongolian warrior. In a 1952 Haggadah illustrated by Ya'akov Zimberknopf, the wicked son is a dog owner.

A 1997 Haggadah edited by Noam Zion and David Dishon is one of the first in which the four children are depicted as daughters. The wicked daughter is dressed as a cowboy and playing with trucks. A 2004 Haggadah illustrated by Michele Kishke portrays the wicked daughter as a middle-aged adult with a cigarette and a book by Amos Oz.

Many Jews love their dog. My daughter plays with trucks all the time. I read Amos Oz. (The Mongolian warrior is just weirdly out of context at a seder.) What was wicked in these Haggadot seems normative to many of us. This discrepancy should caution us against being too certain that we know who today's wicked Jews are. ■

A matzah factory on Ontario Street

Backstory

BILL GLADSTONE

One good thing about matzah is that even after the passage of many months, it often tastes no more stale coming out of the box than when it was first baked. In a parallel vein, I hope the following tales concerning an early matzah factory in Toronto won't seem too stale, even if they go back more than a century.

In March 1908, the Toronto Star reported about the existence of a matzah factory on Ontario Street in the city's east end, near a sizeable cluster of Jewish families who then lived in the neighbourhood. The Star didn't think it important to mention the name of the matzah factory (it was the National Matzo and Biscuit Company), but noted that its employees were working night and day on the production of kosher matzah for the upcoming Passover holiday.

Jews eat matzah at Passover "in remembrance of the curse which in the old days passed over Egypt," the newspaper explained, but it neglected to mention that the Exodus of the Jews from Egypt was so swift there was not enough time for the dough to rise.

However, the Star noted that every stage of the manufacturing process was conducted under strict rabbinical supervision, from the grinding of the flour to the mixing of the flour and water. "The machine used to mix them is only in operation 15 minutes, at the expiration of which time the rabbi orders its removal. One perfectly clean is substituted, and it is used for 15 minutes in its turn."

The dough was rolled under a heavy roller, perforated and cut. Then the unbaked matzah was placed on a conveyer belt, which carried it through a 50-foot-long oven. "The heat of the oven is easily regulated, and by the time the matzah passes through it, it is delicately brown and baked to a turn."

The matzah sold for seven cents a pound, but there was also a tastier and more costly variety available. "The wealthier Jews demand a more expensive matzah, and to gratify them wine, eggs and flour are used in its manufacture," the story reported.

The Ontario Street matzah factory was Canada's first matzah factory. Previously, the Jewish community had to import matzah from the United States and pay an import duty of 25 per cent.

The Kashruth of Matzos, manufactured by us is vouched for by Rabbi Meldola de Sola, of Montreal, Vice-President of the Union of Orthodox Congregations of the United States and Canada, also by the best known rabbis of the Dominion.

One Sunday in 1909, a team of police constables raided the factory from a second-storey window, charging some workers with violating the Christian Sabbath. Toronto mayor Joseph Oliver was publicly annoyed at this, and was not alone in asking the force to adopt a more tolerant posture toward Jewish bakers.

In a letter to a Mr. J. W. Gurofsky, the mayor elaborated: "I received your letter regarding the action of Police Sergeant Pogue, and a constable, in climbing through a second-storey window of the National Matzo and Biscuit Company, Limited, at the rear of 105 Ontario St., where some employees of the company were found preparing dough for baking purposes. You call attention to the fact that nearly all the large bakeries in the city have employees working on Sunday, but that police activity seems to be directed only against bakeries owned by Jews. You also point out that Jews should, if anything, be given a little more latitude than gentiles, inasmuch as the former are permitted to work on Saturday, while the latter are not.

"My own opinion is that the police department should be more tolerant in cases of this kind, and I think some arrangement should be made whereby the police should not interfere in the case of Jewish bakeries... It is my intention to place your letter before the Board of Police Commissioners for consideration at its next meeting."

Sadly, a fire swept through the factory one night in 1908, killing Ephraim Gelman, the night watchman. His wife and five children were still in Minsk at the time, and eventually settled in the United States. (Last summer, one of his great-grandchildren asked me to uncover more information about the tragedy, about which the family had retained only the barest details.)

Apparently, for reasons unknown, the matzah factory on Ontario Street ceased operation after only a few seasons. ■

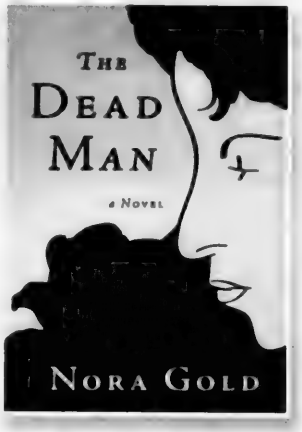
Flying forward, flying back

NORA GOLD

She's never been obsessed before. This is her first time and it's kind of interesting. It's like watching some psychopath in a movie, stalking someone, plotting to kill them, except that the psychopath is her. In Canada it's not so bad – she can't call Jake from Toronto because he'd see the area code and guess it was her. So it's only in his country, in Israel (where she'll be in 90 minutes) that it happens. There she won't be able to walk by a pay phone without having to wrestle down the desire to do again what she has already done numerous times: Dial his number and then keep silent on the end of the line – an ominous, threatening silence. And then hear the anger mount in his voice as he says, "Hello? Hello? Hello?" And then, when he gets no answer, he'll slam down the phone with a bang so loud that it hurts her ear. When Jake's wife answers the phone, though, it's not anger; it's fear. Instead of her voice getting stronger and more violent like Jake's, Fran's gets smaller and thinner ("Hello? Hello? Hello?") till at the end there's almost nothing left of it. It's a high and squeaky-scared voice, like a mouse or a little girl. On one of the last times, though, instead of going squeaky-scared on her third hello, Fran gathered all her remaining strength and called out "Jake!" in a loud, frightened voice – calling him, Eve knew, from the phone on the kitchen counter to Jake's study upstairs. Then Eve hung up fast before Jake could come on the line, and stood in front of the orange pay phone on a Tel Aviv street corner, her knees trembling and her hands sweaty.

Eve looks out of the airplane window. It didn't start out like this – as a form of stalking, or harassment, or whatever this would be considered under Canadian law. It started out just as a phone call because she missed him. She loved him and wanted to hear his voice again. But he told her not to call or write him anymore. He said this had to end once and for all – this relationship of theirs, their love, was destroying his marriage. So Eve wasn't allowed to call him after that. But she needed him still. She needed to hear his voice just one more time. His beautiful, deep voice. Even anonymously, if that was the only way. So she started phoning him and hanging up, each time thinking this time would be the last.



Eve looks out the window at the clouds below. In the beginning dusk, they look like furry, pale grey animals. The backs and sides of hippos, or rhinos. Flying animals floating in the sky. Sleeping in the sky. Jake never sleeps in in the mornings. The first time she called and then hung up on him, it was only six o'clock in Israel, but he was already wide awake. He always woke up before six, and his wife never did before seven, so as Eve had predicted, Jake picked up the phone. He answered the way he always did, with a musical wave in his voice, "Hel-lo-o," with the middle note higher than the others: C, G, E. Eve registered automatically. At that point, Jake's voice still sounded quite normal, if a little surprised at a 6 a.m. call. But after his first hello, when Eve didn't say anything back, it quickly got more insistent: "Hello? Hello?" and then turned frustrated-enraged, "Who is this?" and Eve hung up swiftly in fear. He was yelling at her.

One-and-a-half years after sending her away, after surgically removing her from his life, here he was, yelling at her. But a couple of hours later Eve, though blushing at the memory of this phone call, was also grinning broadly. There was a funny side to it. And it was validating, too. It reminded her of something that deep-down she knew but kept on choosing to forget: that Jake was not the gentle, sensitive man he'd become in her fantasies (or anyway not only this); he was also someone with profound anger and a very short fuse. Laughing, Eve felt powerful. She had played a trick on Jake, but there was no way for him to know it was her, so he couldn't retaliate. However powerless she had felt over the previous year and a half (powerless to regain his love, or even to make herself visible to him), she realized now that she wasn't actually all that powerless. She could call him. She could torment him. So over the next three years, Eve phoned Jake's house five or six times on each of her visits to Israel (which, between conferences, board meetings, and holidays, turned out to be seven different trips). Seven trips at five or six calls each trip – she quickly does the math – that's altogether 35 or 40 calls. This may sound like a lot, but really it's not all that much. Anyway, she had no alternative. She had to keep calling back because she kept missing Jake and getting Fran instead.

The first time this happened, Eve was taken aback by how nice she sounded. Jake's wife had a sweet voice. She was a therapist, Jake had told her once. Not a music therapist, like Eve, or any other real type of therapist – Fran hadn't studied any mental health profession in university; she just did some sort of New Age bodywork. But still, on the phone, Eve could hear some of that in her voice: the therapeutic tone, the desire to proffer help. In this first "conversation" with Fran (which came after Eve had already called and hung up on Jake several times), she could tell that he and Fran had discussed these calls, because Fran reacted now without surprise. She seemed to have decided that the silence on the other end of the line wasn't coming from anybody dangerous. Just a shy first-time client (or maybe a troubled old one) who had dialed her number but then couldn't screw up the courage to ask for an appointment.

"Hello?" said Fran in a normal voice on that first phone call. Then, after Eve said nothing, Fran said "Hello?" again, but this time encouragingly, with a sort of professional kindness. When Eve still didn't answer, Fran asked in a warm, empathic way, "Is there something I can do for you?"

Yes, thought Eve: You can let me be friends with your husband. (Friends – just friends. I would settle now even just for that.) And Fran sounded so nice that Eve, always drawn to, and eager for, kindness and human warmth (and in this case to the therapist-empathy that dripped like milk-and-honey from Fran's voice), nearly said this out loud. But then she remembered that as sweet as Fran sounded on the phone, she was the one who had told Jake that he and Eve couldn't stay friends. Friends — just regular friends — that's all Eve was asking for by then. But even this regular non-physical friendship with Jake meant the world to her. She would never have allowed herself to become intimately involved with him if he hadn't promised her, repeatedly and unequivocally, that for sure – 100 per cent for sure – they would remain friends afterwards, no matter what happened. Staying friends meant to her that she hadn't been cheap. That it hadn't been cheap. That apart from the sex, there had been a real relationship between them. Which there had.

But Fran would not agree. She would not allow Eve and Jake to be even the most casual, innocuous of friends. They couldn't even meet in a public place for a coffee (in Aroma or Caffit), surrounded by dozens of other people (mostly English-speakers like them, and at least a few of whom knew either Jake or Eve) once or twice a year when she came to Israel. So now Eve didn't let herself fall for the sweetness in Fran's voice. Fran was her sworn, lifelong enemy. Eve wouldn't say a word to her, not a single word. She just hung up the phone that day. After that, in the subsequent calls, Fran started sounding afraid.

> Laughing, Eve felt powerful. She had played a trick on Jake, but there was no way for him to know it was her, so he couldn't retaliate.

Then about a year ago, making these phone calls stopped being fun. They even started becoming onerous: a chore, a responsibility, something Eve had to cross off her list of things to do while in Israel. She had no choice but to call Jake at home because he worked primarily at home and was rarely at the institute he'd founded. And she had to call the family phone number because Jake didn't believe in cellphones. And she had to call from a street pay phone - otherwise he or Fran could trace the call to her cellphone or her hotel. And it had to be early in the morning before Fran woke up so that she'd get Jake on the phone, not his wife. And it began feeling like a huge pain, having to wake up early on a holiday, in order to rush to the nearest pay phone a block-and-a-half away before 7a.m.

> Eve realized then that what she was doing was crazy, truly crazy, and maybe she, too, was crazy, tottering somewhere very close to the edge.

But even more than all that, it started to get creepy. Creepy hearing Jake's rage and Fran's fear. Instead of feeling powerful and in control, Eve began feeling powerless and out of control. She wasn't doing this anymore out of her own free will; it had turned into an obsession. A compulsion. An obsessive-compulsive disorder. By this time a year ago, the third week in December, she couldn't walk past any pay phone in Israel without wanting – without needing – to stop and call Jake. This offended her self-respect. What was she – a slave to this thing? Plus one day she told an Israeli friend she had known for many years about these phone calls – told her about them, laughing, like it was a joke she was playing on Jake, just something slightly bizarre. But instead of laughing along with her, her friend blanched and looked at her strangely. Eve realized then that what she was doing was crazy, truly crazy, and maybe she, too, was crazy, tottering somewhere very close to the edge. So she forced herself to stop making these calls.

Still, even though a year has passed since she last phoned Jake (and it's five-and-a-half years since she and Jake parted ways), Eve knows that when she lands in Israel one-and-a-quarter hours from now, and passes her first pay phone in the airport, it will take an enormous effort on her part to just keep on walking. To not stop in front of the pay phone, slide in her phone card, and dial Jake's number, to hear his voice one more time. She turns now toward her window. Outside, darkness is gathering at the edges of the sky and sea. I can do this, she thinks. I'll just do what I did the last time I was here. After they land, after she has collected her bags from the carousel and is heading for the exit, as she approaches the first set of pay phones in the airport, she'll tell herself to keep on going, keep on marching. And at the same time, she'll reach deep into the concealed pocket inside her purse and touch the Israeli phone card she always keeps there, the one with the picture of a tiger on it — this "transitional object" of hers, as she knows it's called in psychology. She'll touch it and she'll stroke it over and over again, the way she once stroked Jake, and the way she used to stroke her favourite doll when she was little and afraid. Her tiger card, smooth and sleek between her fingers, will comfort her and give her strength.

Eve's eyes are shut, and she is lying with her seat pushed back as far as it goes and a blanket over her head. At the beginning of this flight the blanket stank of some industrial cleaning chemical and felt coarse and scratchy against her face. But now she doesn't notice. She's listening to the Largo al Factotum from The Barber of Seville. She doesn't just hear this music; she feels it in her body. Its notes dance like tiny leprechauns on the skin of her arms and up and down the length of her muscles. She can sing this music, dance it, and play it on several instruments. As far back as she can remember, her father walked around the house singing opera, and this aria was one of his favourites. He sang it in the shower, of course, but not only in the shower. Also while making her breakfast. And dressing. Knotting his red bowtie in front of the mirror. Running the comb back through his increasingly thinning hair while he admired his reflection. And then, feeling satisfied with his appearance – and more than that: proud as a peacock – he'd sing to the mirror, "Figaro Figaro Fiiigaro!" with the same joyful, shamelessly bragging self-worship as Figaro himself. Now, listening to this music, she is once again three years old, hearing her father's voice singing "Fffiiiiiigaro!" Or else, she's three years old and cuddled up with him on his lap, listening to music together as they did every Saturday afternoon, just the two of them, before Daddy got married again, to Julia.

First Eve and Daddy would hear an opera on the radio broadcast Live From the Met. Then they listened to records: mainly Schubert, Mozart, and Brahms. Now, listening to The Barber of Seville, she is back in that world.

"Crapper omlep?" someone says right in her ear.

"What?" Confused, groggy, she drags the blanket from her face, causing her earpiece to fall out, putting an end to Rossini. A flight attendant, perky in a navy blue uniform and bright crimson lipstick, is leaning toward her with a smile. "Crepe or omelette?"

Crepe or omelette. "Omelette." But she's sorry as soon as she unwraps the tin foil and is hit by the rotten, institutional smell. She tentatively tries the yogurt – it's sour. The roll, even after she has slathered it with butter and strawberry jam, is so stale when she bites into it that it's inedible. She pushes away her tray.

The pudgy man on her right, however, is digging in with gusto. She watches him for a couple of seconds in amazement: How can he eat that s--t? The man turns and smiles at her. Eight hours ago they chatted for a few minutes before they both went to sleep. He's part of a church group visiting Israel for the first time, which she found interesting until he began talking about the importance of settling every inch of the Holy Land before The Day of Reckoning comes. Now she gives him a vague half-smile, turns away, and again gazes out the window. It's darkening quickly. The sea, the sky, and all the clouds in between are melding together into one big indigo-charcoal-coloured mass. If my clients knew how f----d-up I am, she thinks, they'd never come to me for music therapy. They think I'm so sane and "healthy." When for the past five years, I've been more f----d-up than all of them rolled together.

It's not just the pay phone business, she knows. It's the thousands of letters, maybe the tens of thousands, that she has written to Jake since they broke up. For the first few months, she wrote them down on paper or on the computer. Then after a while it felt like too much work – there were too many words, too many pages – so she just spoke them aloud to him in her head. She was already in the habit of sharing everything with Jake. They'd emailed each other at least four times a day every day of their five-month relationship because he was in Israel and she in Canada (other than the 17 days she spent in Jerusalem). These letters became the emotional focal point of her life, so that even after they broke up, she kept on composing letters to him. Letters full of rage and raging desire, as well as all the other things she felt and thought that she used to discuss with Jake, but now had no one to discuss with. For instance, music. She would be sitting in a concert composing a letter to him, telling him that she found the flutist too "technical" and cold, yet the violinist accompanying her was too romantic and emotional. What do you think? she would ask Jake in the concert hall.

> It's not just the pay phone business, she knows. It's the thousands of letters, maybe the tens of thousands, that she has written to Jake since they broke up.

She also shared with him all sorts of little incidents that occurred in her day-to-day life. The people around her were sometimes strange or hurtful, and imagining Jake's response helped her put into perspective the things they'd said or done. He had an ironic, wry way of seeing things, and he'd look down from above on human folly and stupidity with a sardonic twist of his thin lips. That twist she loved. Those lips she loved. She had never before been with a man with the same sense of humour as her (not even Brian), and it was both a relief and a joy. It was a joy, too, being on the top of Mount Olympus with Jake, standing there side by side with the great man, looking down with him on everyone and everything in the little world below. Jacob Gladstone was a world-renowned music critic, music theorist, and ethno-musicologist who was universally acknowledged as the greatest living authority on Jewish music. He was also credited with the recent renaissance in Jewish sacred music because of the Jewish Institute of Sacred Music (JISM!) that he'd founded 15 years before.

Eve, listening to him talk about his work, felt that through him she had entered the inner circle of the international Jewish music scene. This was confirmed for her when Jake told her what he thought of the latest CD by Nathan Singelman. (The Nathan Singelman: the founder and editor-in-chief of Niggun, the pre-eminent journal of Jewish music.)

"It's second-rate," Jake confided to her on what turned out to be the last of their phone calls. (They spoke on the phone only infrequently because of the risk of Fran overhearing; there were just four calls, one hour each, over the whole five months.) Nathan was 20 years younger than Jake, looked up to him as some sort of father figure/mentor, and paid him handsomely to contribute quasi-regularly to Niggun, playing the role of its in-house public intellectual. Nathan, with an obsequious note attached, had recently sent Jake a copy of his CD to get his opinion of it, and Jake had written him back something complimentary. But to Eve he told the truth.

"It's utterly mediocre," he told her bluntly on the phone. "The first part isn't bad, but then at the end he wimps out. He obviously didn't know how to finish his composition, so he just tied it up with a big phony bow. One of those pat, conventional endings. Shows a total lack of courage and character. You'd never do something like that, Eve – just wimp out. You've got backbone. You're brave."

Of course she loved hearing that at the time. But not long afterwards he left her, and along with the many other things she didn't understand was why he'd said that to her. Why compliment someone you're about to dump? Her friend Bonnie thought this was Jake's way of telling her (and even more so, himself) that she would be OK. She was brave and strong, so he didn't have to worry about her, or feel guilty for what he'd done. Who knows? Eve thinks now. But no, I'm not brave. I'm not brave at all. I wanted to die when you left me. When I got that email from you, it was like someone had blown a hole the size of a cannonball right through my stomach, and I was slowly bleeding to death, though no one seemed to notice. I went on with my daily routine – I had to take care of my boys, I had to earn a living. But all I really did was wait for you to come back.

She sips some water from the plastic bottle on her tray. Her lips were getting dry; the water helps. "Mayim Hayim," says the label, and under it, in letters formed out of different-coloured flowers: "Live Your Life." She pulls the blanket over her head.

There is only one letter to Jake left in Eve now. All those hundreds of thousands of words, all those tens – or hundreds – of thousands of sentences, have boiled down now into just one: the one-line letter she has been writing and re-writing for the past two-and-a-half years. From all its long simmering and bubbling, this letter has, like any well-cooked sauce, become concentrated down to its essentials:

> From all its long simmering and bubbling, this letter has, like any well cooked sauce, become concentrated down to its essentials

Dear Jake,

Thank you for your invitation to meet next time I'm in Israel, but I am going to decline.

She'll be cool but not cold, she decides for the 100 time. She also won't be snarky or hostile, much as that's how she feels. Because at this point Jake is the most powerful man in the world in her field. With a single review, he can make or break someone's reputation – he does it every day – so she can't afford to make an enemy out of him. She is just starting out as a composer – she began composing late in life – and she hopes that maybe he'll even help her at some point (back then he intimated once that he would). So she has written this letter very carefully. Two or three hundred times. Two or three hundred drafts didn't seem to her excessive last week when she thought about it, given what's at stake. It's not that many drafts, she told herself; it's not even one a day for a year. But now as she pulls off the smelly blanket with a sigh and looks out the window, it seems quite mad. And anyway how stupid could she have been to imagine that Jake would ever write to her again? How could she ever have believed something so ridiculous?

But she had. She had because Jake had promised he'd contact her again. And also because she had taken him for what he presented himself as: an honest man, a man of integrity. (He used these words – honesty, integrity – more often than anyone else she had ever met.) So it took her a while to realize that he was a liar. She had laughed with him like a co-conspirator, an insider, when he lied to Nathan Singelman or to Fran. Yet for some reason (naïveté? wishful thinking?) it never occurred to her that sooner or later it would be her turn. In his final email to her, the follow-up to his break-up email, he wrote, We'll meet again, Eve, I'm sure of it. In three-to-five years, when things have cooled down. Even Fran agreed that in three-to-five years we could be friends. You and I have lots to talk about, and when the time is right, we'll do it.

He said three-to-five years. He said so. She had it in writing. So for the next three years, she counted every day she didn't hear from him, and every week, every month, and every year. Counting down to the three-year mark, the earliest possible point of re-connection, according to his promise. When he didn't contact her then, she was astonished and deeply wounded. At the four-year mark, as well, Jake didn't contact her. But both these times she assured herself that he would be in touch with her before the five years were up. She was sure of this, because he'd said "in three-to-five years." Five years was the outer limit. So even though by the last year leading up to the five-year mark, she was functioning fairly well externally – building her music therapy practice, seeing friends, keeping in touch with her two boys, both now away at college, and even doing some composing – in fact all she was doing was waiting to hear from Jake.

But not anymore. The five-year mark came and went six months ago, and now she is starting to really grasp that Jake isn't ever going to contact her again. It's hard to take in emotionally, but intellectually at least, she knows it's true. For Jake, the whole thing's probably in the past, and has been ever since they broke up. Most likely he hasn't thought of her even once in the past five-and-a-half years. Plus even if he did, she is a sore point with his wife, so why would he jeopardize the peace he has re-established with Fran for someone he no longer even cares about?

Of course he'll never write to her again. Why would he?

But still. That letter – the one she keeps re-working in response to the one he'll never send – lives on in her with a life of its own.

Thank you for your invitation to meet next time I'm in Israel, but I am going to decline. At this late date, I don't think we have anything to say to each other... (No, don't write that.)

This letter pops into her head unbidden, whenever it wants, as do a few other specific phrases:

Do you love me?
Hold me. Hold me tighter.
I've never loved anyone more in my life.
You don't love me anymore, do you?

> All those letters she wrote to Jake, and all those letters she read of his, were not (as her father used to say) a total loss.

No. You don't care if I'm alive or dead.
I don't love you either.
I haven't loved you for a long time now.
Please don't love me anymore.

These phrases, like the letter, don't have meaning the way such phrases or sentences usually do. They don't mean what they appear to mean. They're old, dead words – words that have lost their meaning – but somehow keep popping up, and ejaculating themselves, inside of her. They're like a computer glitch, some weird default computer program that keeps appearing on your screen. They're a stupid, meaningless recurring tic.

Not surprising, though. None of this is uncommon in people who have been traumatized, thinks Eve, as the lights in the cabin turn a shade brighter. I have a broken mind. I've never had a broken mind before. A broken heart, yes. Other men have broken my heart. But only Jake has broken my mind.

She begins to laugh. Crazy. Crazy. Waiting all this time. Wasting all this time. Crazy. And sad.

As she laughs, she hears a baby cry on the other side of the cabin. It cries in just two tones – from a high A to a high B-flat – over and over again. How do babies know how to cry in musical intervals? she wonders. She straightens out her messed-up blankets and retrieves her earpiece from the tangle. Well, one thing that's not sad is music. All those letters she wrote to Jake, and all those letters she read of his, were not (as her father used to say) a total loss. She got a beautiful song cycle out of them.

About a year ago, on a long, boring, rainy day, she started setting some of their letters to music, and in a way used these to tell the story of their whole relationship, and she likes how it came out. She patterned this composition on the love songs Schumann wrote for Clara and presented to her on the night before their long-awaited wedding. Originally Eve called her song cycle The Life Cycle of Love, but by the time it was finished, she was juggling titles like The Death Cycle of Love, The Bi-Cycle of Love, and Cycles of Love and Hate. She still hasn't settled on a title and she also doesn't yet have an ending. But now she begins to hum one of the letter-songs from this cycle under her breath, softly, so Born Again won't hear. This one is a medley of some of the things that Jake said or wrote to her five -and-a-half years ago.

"For a single hour with you, I would burn every music score in the world."

"I've never loved anyone in my life more than I love you now."

"You're the best friend I've ever had. I've never before had a friend like you."

"Look at me, I'm crying I'm so happy. I haven't cried since I was seven years old."

"I'm a new man. I'm not the same person who walked into this hotel room four days ago. You've given me a new life."

"I can't imagine living my life ever again without you in it. We'll always be together, Eve, one way or another. At the very least as friends. That much I can promise you for sure."

The letter-song that she is humming now is set to flute, harp, and strings, one of her favourite combinations because of Mozart's concerto for these instruments. Her letter-song has various complex strands, and multiple voices interweaving with each other, but at the same time it has a simple, beautifully haunting, singable theme. As she quietly hums it, she can feel herself lying in Jake's arms. She is safe and secure, knowing how much he loves her.

The flight attendant with the bright crimson lipstick reaches over Eve's pudgy neighbour to collect her tray. "It's almost untouched," Eve tells her. Almost untouched is another way of saying almost virginal, but you can't be "almost" a virgin; either you're a virgin or you're not. The flight attendant removes Born Again's tray. Born Again is bug-eyed now, watching the beginning of an episode of Curb Your Enthusiasm. Eve's amazed. What kind of an idiot starts watching a 30-minute TV show 25 minutes before landing? Doesn't he realize they're going to turn it off in the middle? Pull the plug on Larry David? He'll be right in the middle of a sentence, and the screen will go dark.

> She begins to hum one of the letter-songs from this cycle under her breath, softly, so Born Again won't hear.

On her neighbour's screen Larry David looks sort of like Jake. He has much less hair, and straighter hair, than Jake. But still there is something similar about the two of them. They're both white-haired, lanky, 65- or 75-year-old Jewish males. They're both impatient men who don't suffer fools gladly. And they're both brilliant, charismatic, socially awkward, neurotic, tender-hearted, cruel, narcissistic, endearing, and f----d-up. Of course, to be fair, there are differences between them, too. Jake is an intellectual, a thinker, and "LD" just a comedian. Jake is a serious person; LD is funny. Very, very funny. Or as LD would say, "Pretty, pretty..."

Suddenly there's no more Larry David; the screen's gone black. The pilot's voice booms over the loudspeaker: "This is your captain speaking. We are now beginning our descent into Israel."

Eve, even though she anticipated Larry David's disappearance, is annoyed by it. Descent? she thinks contemptuously. One doesn't descend to Israel; one ascends. Arrival in Israel is a spiritual ascension. Don't Canadian pilots know anything?

"Please place all your hand luggage below the seat in front of you, switch off all electronic devices, and fasten your seat belts."

She obeys. But as she is shoving her carry-on under the seat in front of her, some of those phrases return.

I don't love you anymore. I don't. I haven't loved you for years.

Then: Do you love me?

There's a pause.

No. Of course you don't. You don't care if I'm alive or dead.

She straightens up in her seat and looks out the window: blackness dotted with yellow lights.

Not You don't care, she corrects herself: He. He doesn't care. Third person. Stop talking to him like he's still your eternal I-Thou after all this time. It's been five-and-a-half years.

The plane plummets and she feels her stomach plummet, too. She clutches both armrests, her eyes shut tight. The plane drops again; it feels like it's diving, and she thinks she is going to vomit. Then the plane steadies itself. She opens her eyes. Gradually her stomach settles down. This thing with Jake, apart from everything else, is embarrassing. First of all because of its banality. The powerful older man at the peak of his career, and the young woman just starting out as a musician (or anyway the younger woman – 50 to his 65). It's such a cliché. Secondly, it's embarrassing because she can't get over it. She's not a fool. She knew from the beginning that a relationship between a married man and an unattached woman couldn't last. But even so, here she is, stuck in this state, and unable to move forward. It doesn't make any sense that she should be so f-----up over what was, after all, just a five-month affair. She wasn't like this even after Brian died, and he was her husband and she'd loved him for over 15 years. She did suffer terribly at first after Brian's death, but then she quickly recovered. She had no choice, in a way, 10 years ago: Michael was 10 and Ethan was eight; she couldn't just fall apart. Yet here it is five-and-a-half years since she and Jake parted ways, and she's still obsessed with him day and night. There's something here she doesn't understand. Some mystery she can't solve.

Now the plane lands in a series of three rough bumps. Loud clapping erupts. Right. Israelis always clap whenever a plane lands. Celebrating survival – implicitly reminding you of all the possible disasters you have just narrowly escaped. The plane is still coasting along the runway, but already people are standing up, taking down coats and parcels from overhead compartments, phoning relatives and friends to say they've arrived, and squinting at hand-held devices to check their email. Good idea, thinks Eve. I should see what I've missed while up in the air. Probably 10 or 15 emails. Still sitting in her seat (practically the only person on the plane not yet standing up), she turns on her BlackBerry. Maybe, she thinks, I'll have an email from Jake. ■

A single red rose

JOSEPH PERETZ

Out of the ashes of the Holocaust two orphans found each other back and united, eked out a living with all the ups and downs. One thing remained constant in their life – not a year would go by and regardless of the circumstances, every birthday or anniversary would not pass without a dozen red roses my wife's favourite flowers, would grace the breakfast table.

We enjoyed life to the fullest until one day my sweetheart was stricken with Alzheimer's, that terrible disease, which like a thief steals your brain and condemns you to a zombie-like existence. She would sometimes smile at me with that far away look in her beautiful eyes and I wondered if she remembered me or if she even knew who I was.

I spent every day with her since I was fortunate to obtain the room next to hers at Baycrest. She had a wonderful caregiver and often we would walk together, at first with a walker and then in a big wheelchair. Our children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren would visit Bubby regularly and she just would smile at them.

Her condition worsened rapidly and her doctor, with a sad expression, told me to expect the worst. The whole night I sat at her bedside, holding her hand while she struggled and gasped until her last breath and after 72 years of a long and happy marriage, I lost my life partner.

I don't know what made me look at the clock. It was 4:35 a.m. – these numbers will forever remain engraved on my broken heart.

I was lucky that my daughter and son-in-law looked after the arrangements for the funeral. I was in a daze, the only thing I remembered is that it was very cold.

I was in shock, my organs stopped functioning. I went from x-ray to ultrasound and everything in between. My wife's caregiver became my caregiver and thanks to the good and obstinate care of the doctor, I slowly overcame my problems.

Now it was spring. My daughter who had looked after everything told me to be ready for the unveiling of the monument. I asked her to get me a red rose before going to the cemetery.

It was a dull, rainy day when we arrived at Pardes Shalom. As soon as the rabbi unveiled the monument, the sky opened up with a downpour as if someone up there joined in my grief. When I deposited the single rose on top of the monument amid the customary pebbles deposited by family members I was hoping that the rain, mixed with my tears would keep the red rose alive for a while. ■ Magen David Adom is no ordinary emergency service...

As Israel's official national rescue and blood services organization, it provides emergency medical services and blood services to the people of Israel, as well as humanitarian aid to other countries in times of crisis. This requires a vast amount of resources, vehicles, equipment and supplies. Emergency vehicles must be maintained, medical equipment and supplies need to be replenished.
All of MDA's equipment, medical and blood products are supplied solely by the Diaspora. That is why your donation is so important.

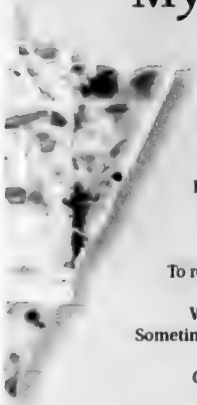
My holiday poem

ZOE CHANDLER



Passover is a special time of the year.
It tells us that spring is near.

HaShem saved us, he opened the seas.
He gave us freedom, you and me.

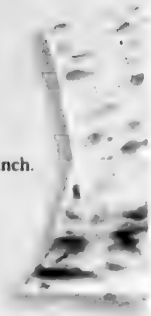
Off to Mount Sinai, we did go.
To receive HaShem's laws, made out of stone.

We bite our matzah and hear it crunch.
Sometimes we get to have matzah ball soup for lunch.

Candles, lettuce, grape juice and wine,
God helped us, he heard us whine.

Eggs, matzah, charoset are delish.
Won't you please, put some on my dish.

We learn the story and the four questions at school.
Being with our friends and family during Pesach is super cool!



Almost April

GAIL BERMAN

One day when Rose went into her kitchen and made ready to cook up her chicken,
She happened to look upon the wall,
where the calendar her attention did call.

It was close to the end of March, and time was passing as quick as a dart.
Rose had realized that it was almost April, and Pesach soon the days would fill.

Rose had to think about family and friends, and how she would accommodate to that end.
There were relatives to invite from both sides,
to the two seders, like every year to abide.

There was cooking and baking fine kosher treats,
And Rose could achieve all without missing a beat.

The time would arrive in April, to be sure,
With Pesach and Rose's home so pure.

To all our friends, family and the entire Jewish community, we extend our warmest wishes for a Happy, Healthy and Peaceful Passover!

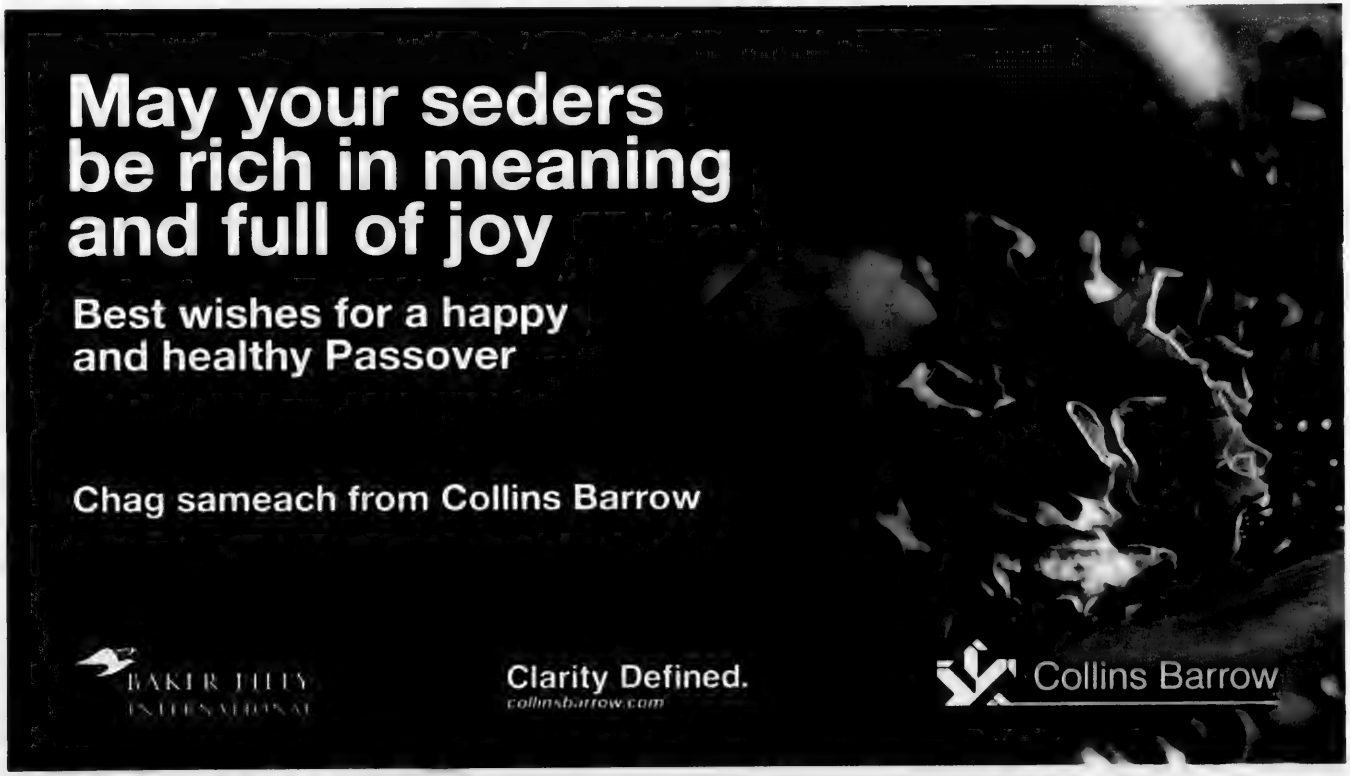
A flurry of motherhood remembered

SOPHIE SOIL

I can well remember mama sitting at her sewing machine, feet pedaling furiously, by her side bits of chalk, a humungous scissors and a dish of pins; large hands ever busy threading needles, cutting patterns, making seams, darts, gathers, tucks and hems; a flurry always in a hurry to finish a project, cook, wash, clean, in between dishing out a bit of love; either lecturing an errant apprentice, or having endless fittings, or making her own patterns from old newspaper, muttering something in a language I couldn't understand; and all of this, to be finished and put away before Shabbos, when her always busy hands would stop for the duration, only being used to light Friday night candles and praying in the synagogue next day.

During the week, her voice gargantuan and looming, hands sometimes slapping, mapping deeply-etched genetic lessons forming shoots, roots, shaping what was to happen; hands and tongue meant to shake, curb, mend a scarred world pain-proof; a world where being Jewish was a thing to be despised, tortured and obliterated, a world so cruel, it forgot the meaning of humaneness and remembered only hate.

Young as I was, what I decided was: people are cruel basically; enveloped in a blind miasma of hate and armed with a dagger of greed forged by an envy they cannot even put a name to, the object of that hate and envy starts looking like something to abhor and punish, and they cannot remember for what; and the object of that hate and envy finds itself in a disintegrating world making you pay for something you don't even remember doing. But when their callous inclinations in the shape of crooked crosses are worn on their sleeves and in their quasi-hearts, it becomes inhumanity at its worst, with love and peace and brotherhood reduced to ashes left to linger in its own demise....



May your seders be rich in meaning and full of joy
Best wishes for a happy and healthy Passover

Zaydie's lucky feather

JULIE BERGMAN

"Zaydie!" David shrieked as he raced down the stairs. He pushed off the bottom step and leapt into his grandfather's outstretched arms.

"Davey!" Zaydie cried as he squeezed his arms around David's waist.

David reached up and snatched the hat off of his grandfather's head. "Zaydie?" David asked. "How come every time you come to visit you wear a hat with a feather in it?"

"Oh, my boy," Zaydie explained. "This is not just any feather. This is my lucky feather."

David's eyes widened. "Lucky?" he asked.

"Yes," Zaydie said. "Every time I wear this feather, something extra special happens to me."

David set the hat on top of his own thick pile of curls. "Wow, Zaydie! Can I borrow your lucky feather? So something extra special can happen to me too?"

"Well," answered Zaydie, "I suppose it would be okay, as long as you promise to take good care of it."

David beamed. "I promise."

The next day, David carefully tucked Zaydie's feather into his pocket. He stroked the smooth quills and imagined all of the wonderful things that might happen to him that day.

At school, his English teacher, Mrs. Mayer announced. "Class, I need a volunteer to be my special helper today."

David quickly threw up a hand. His other hand slipped into his pocket and grasped onto the feather. "Please be me," David mumbled.

"Lucy, you are the lucky one," Mrs. Mayer declared.

David's arm dropped limply and landed on his desk with a thud. He slowly loosened his grip on the feather.

Gym class was next. Mr. Rosenberg was about to pick the captains for the day's soccer match. Once again, David dug his hand deep into his pocket.

"Justin and Abbey," Mr. Rosenberg announced. "Pick your teams."

David scowled. Why wasn't Zaydie's feather working?

That night, David lay in bed, rolling the feather between his palms. The softness of the quills tickled him as they brushed back and forth against his skin. What was he doing wrong? Was he supposed to make a wish on the feather or hold it in a certain way?

"I know!" David cried. "I have to wear the feather in a hat, just like Zaydie does."

David bounded off to school the next morning with Zaydie's lucky feather perched high in his favourite cap. "Today is going to be a great day," he announced. But as the day wore on, David's excitement faded.

That evening David played baseball. It was his favourite sport and with Zaydie's feather in his hat, he was sure to shine. His team was down by a run heading into the last inning. David was up to bat. He dug his heels into the dirt and reached up to pat the feather that peaked out beneath his batting helmet. David pounced on the first pitch and sent the ball rocketing through the air.

"Yes," David cheered as he raced to first base. The outfielder fumbled the ball so David pumped his arms and sprinted across the infield, sliding forcefully into second base.

A cloud of dust swirled around him as the voice of the umpire rang out, "You're out!"

David stomped off the field. He ripped the feather from his cap and flung it to the ground. He kicked at the earth and covered the feather with dirt. Suddenly, David stopped and looked down at the mess he had made. He scooped up the feather and frantically dusted it off.

The next day, Zaydie came to visit. "What is it, my Davey?" Zaydie questioned when he saw David's grim face.

"Zaydie," said David. "I ruined your lucky feather. I promised you that I would take good care of it, but the feather didn't work and I got angry."

> He ripped the feather from his cap and flung it to the ground.

Zaydie raised an eyebrow. "Didn't work?"

"Yes," said David. "I waited and waited, but nothing special happened to me."

"Oy, Davey!" laughed Zaydie. "My feather is not magic. It brings me good luck because every time I wear it, I come to visit you. What could be more special than that?"

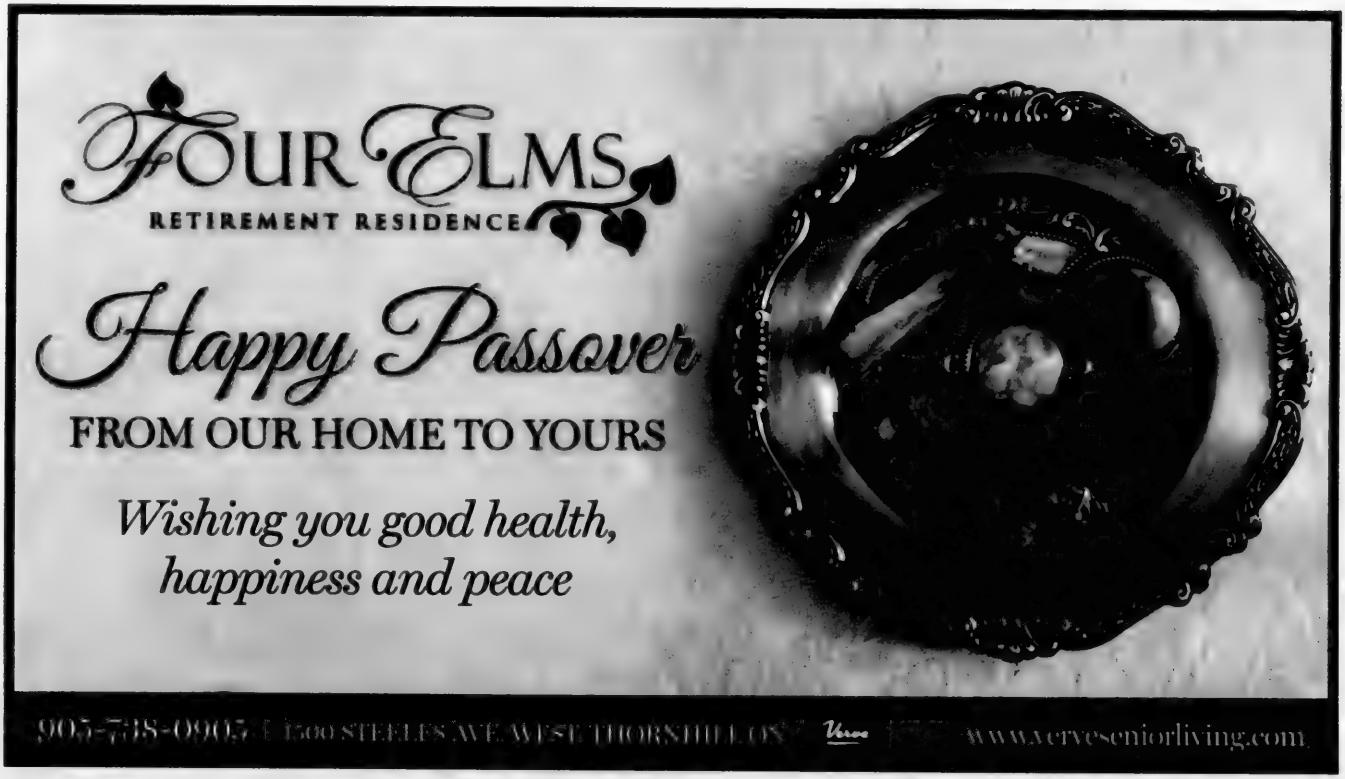
David thought for a moment and then laughed too. "I guess something lucky happened to me after all, Zaydie," David said. He jumped up on his grandfather's lap and hugged him tightly. "Today, I got to be with you!" ■

Bubbie's brisket

RYAN ALLEN

Brisket is not a food for me, it is more an experience. First, it's a feast for the senses. Try to imagine a soft, moist, chewy brisket that has been bathed in its own juice, wine, onions, and fresh garlic. We inhale the cooking aroma from the brisket, cooked the night before and then left in its juices, so that the scent of sweet sauteed onions and wine-drenched meat invites us, and our mouths water the entire day leading up to the meal. Then we taste the meat itself, a bit salty with a hint of bitterness and the savoury taste of aged wine.

Bubbie's brisket brings people in our family together like nothing else. Prepared from her own recipe, Bubbie would make it for our entire extended family at every Friday night dinner. Bubbie valued family and being together more than anything, and that's why, even though she is gone, we continue to eat and talk and joke about her delicious brisket to honour her and what she loved. For me, brisket is not just a delicious savoury food for us, but a reminder from my late grandmother about the importance of family. It continues to bring us together every Friday night. ■



Sammy the thief

RONALD LEVY

I'm not sure when I first became aware of talk of the black sheep of our family. I knew I was young, so young, that I didn't know what "black sheep" meant. But, through the sharp intake of air and downward turning of my father's mouth when Uncle Sammy's name was mentioned, I understood that Uncle Sammy was persona non grata, in our home.

Maybe I should tell you a little about my family.

My grandparents were from Russia, as were their parents and their parents' parents.

When my grandparents fled from Europe, the latest pogrom being the straw that broke the Jewish dromedary's back, they came with few possessions, some religious articles and one prized possession, the family heirloom.

In the harried time of departure from the old land and arrival in the new, somehow this heirloom was lost. Where, how? No one really knew. However, there was a suspicion that one of my father's three brothers had taken it, claimed it as his own, his birthright. Uncle Sammy, I was told, had vehemently denied this to his parents and his siblings.

No matter, he was tried and convicted in the court of family opinion, and without one iota of proof, he was cast out, soon after the family settled into their new home in Canada.

Over the years, Sammy, by then labelled "Sammy the thief", had moved away and lost touch with his parents and his brothers. The next generation had never met or even seen him. In my family, "Sammy the thief", was the stuff of legend, not a living breathing person.

When my beloved grandparents passed, there was no sign of Sammy at their funerals or shivahs.

Over the years I remember talking to my father about his family. He was very giving of his recollections, as faint as they were, of his early years in the old country, of cheder, of carp in the bathtub before the yom tovim and the life of Jews in that precarious time and place. He spoke fondly of his grandparents, his parents and his two, yes, two brothers.

"But Papa," I asked, "didn't you have three brothers?"

That innocent question provoked the characteristic sharp intake of air and downturned mouth and a shake of the head. "No," he replied, "your Uncle Sammy is dead to us."

Not willing to accept this simple pronouncement I pursued my question. "Why?" I asked. "What did he do to deserve this treatment?" "He stole from the family," he replied. "What did he steal Papa?" I asked. After some hesitation and obvious internal conflict he blurted out, "The family silver seder plate." And that was the end of the discussion.

Years witnessed my brothers and sister flourish, take mates and have children. The years stood by as my Papa grew old and my beloved Mama passed away.

The years stood testament to family celebrations and festive holiday meals. Some of us stayed the traditional course set by our grandparents, some strayed from that road but all staying true to our roots, culture and people.

I became a teacher, sprinkling the course material on Jewish philosophers with stories inspired by the hours spent with my father and his tales of the old world.

I was a specialist on Rabbi Soleveichik, a teacher himself and a leading Jewish thinker. From time to time I was called upon to lecture, to share my perspective on this towering intellect of our people.

One such speaking engagement took me to Berkeley, Calif. The Hillel House was sponsoring a symposium on Rabbi S., as I liked to refer to him, and I, along with another professor, who coincidentally had the same last name as mine, were invited to talk.

With literally thousands of North American Jews sharing that name, it was not that surprising to see two professors who shared both an interest in Jewish thinkers of the 20th century and a last name.

After our talks, scheduled for late afternoon on a Friday, which, I would add were well received, the two of us sat down for coffee and some Jewish geography.

"Where is your family from?" he asked.

"Well, my father came here as a young child with his parents from Vitebsk. You probably have not even heard of it. It was a very small town, even by Jewish shtetl standards."

It was not that surprising to see two professors who shared both an interest in Jewish thinkers of the 20th century and a last name.

"What a coincidence," he said. "My grandparents also came from around there."

"My father had three brothers," I offered "but we only stayed in contact with two of them. There is a family legend about the third brother stealing a family heirloom, a silver seder plate."

"My father," he said, "also had family, but he lost contact with them soon after coming to America. I know nothing about them."

We moved on to other topics and by the end of the afternoon we had become friends.

He kindly invited me to stay with him, to meet his wife and children and I gratefully accepted.

That night, Friday evening, we arrived at his home to a beautifully set Shabbat table. His wife and children greeted me warmly and I was introduced to all. Miriam, his wife, Jordan, Sarah and his youngest, named after his grandfather who had passed 10 years ago, but whose name got lost in the pre-blessing tumult.

After a beautiful supper, strangely reminiscent of Shabbat meals at my father's table, I was led to the basement where I was to sleep.

"Sammy," my host called out to his son, "please bring our guest some pillows."

"If you need anything," he called down, "please do not hesitate to ask...after all," he added, "family is family."

I did not quite understand this comment, until settling in, a little later, and taking in the place that was to be my room for the night, I spotted, hanging on the wall, a beautiful, gleaming, silver seder plate.

"Oh," he called down, "by the way. Don't even think about it!"

In memory of Adam Fuerstenberg

PEARL ADLER SABAN

"Are you writing?"
he'd ask me whenever our paths would cross.
"I want you to write something,"
he encouraged me time and time again.

"Um..."
I'd falter and make excuses.

He felt me capable of reaching a wide audience, recognized my ability to weave Jewish concepts and Hebrew expressions into my imagery,
into my stanzas.

He gave me opportunities to see my words in print, then had me stand before my peers to share them –
like a learned one spouting fine words of Torah.
Like a teenaged girl delivering a bat mitzvah speech.
Like the youngest child standing tall at a seder,
reciting the ages-old
Four Questions,
Mah nishtanah ha'lailah hazeh mi-kol ha'lailot?
Why is this night different from all other nights?

Why, indeed?

The man with the smiling eyes,
with the generous spirit,
with the gift of gab – whose speech was peppered with mamaloshen
is now absent.

Little grandmother

KENNETH SHERMAN

My little grandmother in a smeared apron wire-rimmed spectacles you died when I was a child

my image of you blurry as if seen through frosted glass

you kept chickens in your yard that you butchered and wrapped sent my mother a young girl to carry stinking packages down Baldwin Street collecting cold quarters from customers

you told me nothing of the pogroms, wars your sisters in cattle cars

you didn't want to deprive me of childhood
turn my happiness to cinders

your painterly apron's red and yellow the blood and fat of slaughtered fowls breasts, drumsticks, featherless wings

I recall you saying the days are long the years
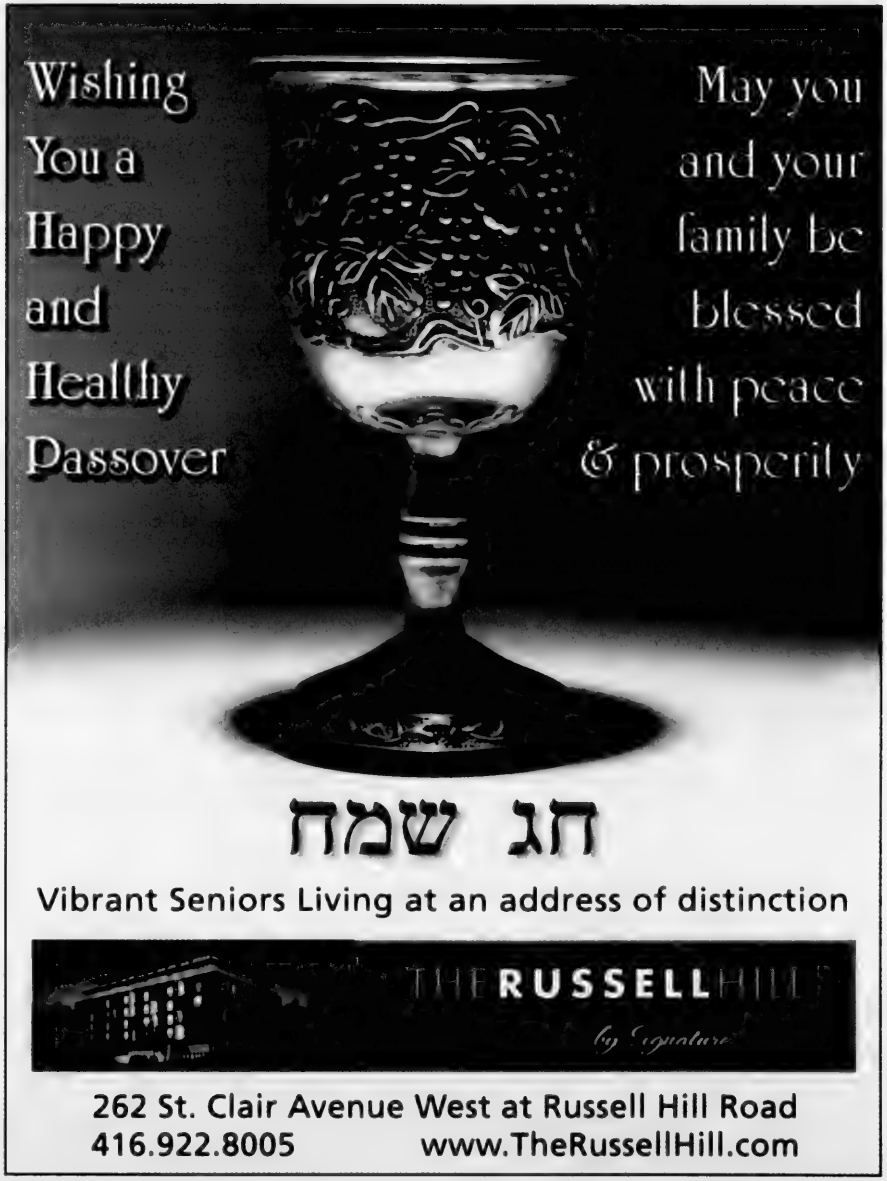
short



On time: Montreal, 1989

JUDY BATALION

"Is everyone ready?" I called from my room.

One of my eyes was focused on the mirror as I checked out my creation – an all-white Working Girl power suit from Jacob Jr. with shoulder pads, a pleated skirt, and a blue and white polka-dot shirt that sported a medieval jester's six-inch collar, all of which molded my 12-year-old shapeless physique into the strong, sharp contour – of a square. I'd had my hair done the day before; I'd gone with Samantha Horowitz and her mother Fran to the salon in the Cavendish Mall. Samantha got a flowing perm, but I knew Dad would freak out (no piercings, tattoos, or perms—NOTHING PERMANENT) so I just said "tease me" and lord. Sylvain the Quebecois Indian hairdresser who bore an incredibly suspect resemblance to Vanilli (including both leather pants and mane) had split my fringe in two, making half my hairs stand on guard, while the other half were plastered down my forehead. Then he'd blow-dried my long frizzy tresses straight, his arms sinewy as he drew out the strands, humming at how alluring I appeared. Girl . . . you know it's true. Of course, sleeping on it all night had not tamed the look, shall we say, and now several areas of the do were fully erect. Worse, the bottom of my hair turned outward like a '70s artsy fling. I used two brushes and all my strength to try to curl these tasteless waves under, power-woman straight. Overall, the look had the sexual appeal of smoked trout.

"Everyone? Anyone?"

My other eye was on the clock. June 12, 1989, 9:48 a.m. In 72 minutes, I'd become a woman!

I brushed harder. Damn rebellious hair ends. "Hello?"

No answer, except for the sound of morbid trumpet calls and a voice so deep it was as if the speaker had awoken from his own death. It's Jewish hour, emanated from one of the many radios that were always on in the house, crowding even the air with sound waves. Today: a new story from the gas chambers. "Hello?"

I ran down the slippery hall (particularly so due to my fishwife beige stockings) to the den, where Dad lounged hidden behind his papers. I smelled rare minty aftershave and saw his shoes sticking out from beyond the newsprint. He was ready, as always. Eli, on the other hand, was wearing a shirt and navy blazer, but no pants. "Eli!" "I have 212 lines," he said from behind his Game Boy.

"Wow." That was pretty good. We were both obsessed with Tetris. I spent my days trying, in my imagination, to make the shapes around me fit neatly together—which this house's piles of expired TV Guides and bargain basement towels did not. At school, I'd dropped out of drama, choir, and the annual reading competition to become a scientist, like Dad. I was a math nerd, drawn to balanced equations, ordered graphs, patterns that plotted neatly along the x-time-axis.

"It's getting fast," Eli said, his thumbs punching with force.

The more blocks that dropped, the more time that passed, the faster it all became, heading toward frenzy. I understood. Nintendo was one of our sibling ways of interacting along with a slew of imaginary characters – the Ukrainian Robot, Tony the Tiger, the jailer of Nottingham – that had peopled our make-believe games and our real conversations. "When you're done, please put on your pants, Captain Crunch," I pleaded and left for the kitchen, where I assumed I'd find Mom among the piles. "Mom." I took a deep breath. Gentle, abrupt. I was always saying the wrong thing. "Mom, I—"

She wasn't there.

"Mom?" My heart skipped, but excited for the day, I had hope.

Her absence could be a good sign! Perhaps she was ready, slipping on her shoes, grabbing her coat, spraying on the final touches of her Charlie or Jean Naté or even Dior Poison that Dad had bought her as a special gift last summer (the name was so apt, Dad hadn't even made jokes about it), beaming, proud. Normal. Her present to me.

I hopped to her room. "Mom!" But as I opened her broken blue folding door, the one that was missing several hinges so it actually lunged toward me when I moved it (a relic of the former home owners, 1960s divas whose bold taste we never erased but instead covered over with layers of mess) I glimpsed Mom's backside, her beige tights pulled over extra-large underwear, the rolls on her sides. She was sitting at her desk, in front of a complex of boxes filled with colourful fastening supplies: paper clips, pins, sewing kits. "Mom."

"Shut the door, Judy. I'm getting dressed."

"We have an hour," I said. "Until my actual bat mitzvah."

"I know." She didn't turn around. "Now go."

Behind her loomed her king-size bed, the real Mount Kildare, stacked with clothes, blankets, and papers that now covered its entire surface except for a small edge where Mom slept. I wanted to hang out with her in the evenings and watch Thirtysomething, pretending I understood it and laughing along with her chuckles, but there was no room. A broken door wasn't the same as an open door.

> The women in my family kept stuff, not time.

I tucked my worry into myself, and decided to go practice my speech. This wasn't really a bat mitzvah, just a group simchah; the girls – all nine of whom I would be celebrating my personal coming of age with – would not read from the Torah. Though my Montreal Jewish community was obsessed with Club Med and teppanyaki dining, and though my school taught experimental Hebrew poetry instead of prayer, the synagogues were strictly Orthodox, and there was no such thing as a bat mitzvah in Jewish tradition. Instead of reading from the Torah or leading prayers, we girls gave speeches about Jewish themes we'd studied. This was fine with me. School – with its clear systems, tests, grades – was my forte; my solidity.

For my speech, I'd picked my favourite holiday. "Passover is the celebration of freedom. It commemorates spring. It is a time of fresh starts. A holiday symbolized by the egg, itself the symbol of the circle. Of life. Cyclical life." Then there was the fact that Passover was the quintessential holiday of order. Obsessive order. The word seder means order; the whole evening begins with a chronologically determined to-do list and ends with a repetitive chant about goats. Ten plagues, 10 commandments, four glasses of wine, three forefathers, two tablets.

The one meal of the year that my family ate at home, together, at the same time.

"Mom?" Forty-five minutes. No answer. The rush to flee Egypt. Why is this night different from all other nights? But, of course, it wasn't.

The women in my family kept stuff, not time. Neither Mom nor Bubbie arrived at any destination less than extremely tardy, be it after-school pickup, or a play where I had to squeeze between legs to get to my seat for a show that had started without me. When I was five or six, every Saturday we used to go shopping and it would take hours for Mom to get ready, while Dad, Eli, and I engaged in the elaborate gymnastics of peeling on and off coats, circling in the rusted blue faux-wood-paneled Pontiac station wagon with the engine running, the heat blowing into the backseat from the one working vent at the front, the freezing and boiling air mixing, causing the windows to fog up like a dream scene as Dad silently grew angrier and we waited for Mom to come trundling out of the house, dredging heavy bags on each arm. Then there would be stops: the bakery, the library where she had to negotiate fees for her overdue books, and finally, Bonimart – the discount store with a psychedelic orange and yellow globe in its "B" – the crowning glory atop the Decarie Square, a mall that was an architectural mess, not a square at all but a conglomerate of crevices and levels, arriving at 4:50 to a store that closed at five o'clock.

We had to climb several escalators to reach the apex of Decarie, which always seemed to be perpetually on its last legs, dying since the day it was built (even the name sounded like decay). Mom planted herself on a step, Dad carried Eli, then two years old, and I would lose my mind, alternately staring at the mock marble walls with grey splodges that looked like ash, and my black Casio watch, wishing for the numbers to freeze, running up the moving walkway that never moved fast enough. Did she not see the time? What if we were locked in, forgotten?

Mom would finally arrive and start her full-on shopping mission, examining circulars, picking up products, while my heart beat, my colon bloated. She was in no rush, took her time price-shopping for the best paper towel deals, while the metal grate at the front of the store began to descend, clinking with each inch. I was on watch, noticing every movement, aware of each announcement on the loudspeaker: "Chers clients, nous fermerons nos portes dans cinq minutes." The voice may have been chipper but the message was militaristic: customers, you have five minutes left. We would be stuck here forever, trapped. I would cry, tears streaming down my ashen face, begging for us to go. None of this bothered my mother, and even my father could not understand my panic. Who's gonna lock us in? he tried to calm me. They don't WANT us here all night.

But no rationale helped, and eventually I refused to enter. While they shopped, I waited on the threshold of the store, looking up at the gate's metal teeth, making sure that I was on the other side of the boundary. I would not be swallowed up by Bonimart! I felt safer being alone outside the store than inside with my parents, with my mother, even though, as I reminded myself now, she never did get locked in.

> Every third cousin, each hairy-eared uncle, the entire transplanted shtetl of Radzymin would be in attendance.

"Eli, pants!" I called, and went to his room to lay them out on his bed next to his MAD magazines, risking Mom's anger. You're not his mother, she accused me when I tried to care for him. She was right. Even then, I knew my efforts were as much an attempt for me to take control of my world as they were to help him. I felt guilty for being bossy, selfish, needy, but also angry. Do you think I want to be his mother?

My heart pranced out triple lutzes. I needed distraction. Forty-five minutes until womanhood, until somehow, I prayed, I would magically be transformed into a specimen of grace and self-composure, with hair that turned inward and bangs that never clumped together due to increasing forehead sweat.

Why did it have to be this way? This delay made no sense, especially since I knew Mom wanted me to have the bat mitzvah. I thought of the enormous birthday parties she threw for Eli and me when we were younger, the house overrun with cakes and party sandwiches. How long would it be before she returned to that state, the star storyteller who entranced the kids, my cousins all wanting to sit in her lap as she spun tales about fallen heroes, a chatty host with piquant laughter, the extra dining room sets coming into their own? When would she finally be less tired again?

Mom wanted this bat mitzvah, I consoled myself. She'd participated, gone to all the meetings in the living rooms of the other mothers (families who went to Benihana and sang "hands up, baby, hands up" while mine went for early bird specials that included unlimited trips to the knish bar, and "hands up" reminded them of the Gestapo). Each of the other girls, most of whom I had anxiety just conversing with, let alone blossoming into my full womanly expression with, had invited 10 family members to the service and luncheon, whereas my mother, the least wealthy but most caught up in abstract notions of family, had fought vehemently to secure us 80 tickets – every third cousin, each hairy-eared uncle, the entire transplanted shtetl of Radzymin would be in attendance.

They'd all be there. Waiting. Thirty-eight minutes. "Mom! We have to leave."

"It doesn't take a half hour to get there." "But there's parking, and red lights, and . . ."

"I need to do the place cards." Now? "You're the one stalling me, Judy." Me?

Sweat was trickling, my armpits dampening, tights chafing. I tried to rehike my shoulder pads and straighten the power angles of my suit. Then I remembered! I splayed my hands out in front of me, stretching each finger to its maximum: my first manicure, electric pink French, selected by Fran Horowitz. My nails were shiny, neat with a perfect sliver of white crowning their rounded tops. Samantha had also had a pedicure, but I declined. (Ay, who's gonna see your toes? Dad's voice echoed in my mind.) Dad had taken me shopping, let me buy the full-priced white flats with the blue polka-dot bows that matched my shirt, a detail I was sure would command attention and awe. I ran to my room and took them out of their box, smelling their fresh leather. With my flawless fingers, I slipped them on – they fit perfectly. Then – my final anointment accessory – a shpritz of Exclamation eau de toilette. I smelled like orange-crush-scented baby powder. I was completely ready.

I scurried back to Mom's room, her door knocking on me, her boundaries flailing in every direction. Lately, I'd been using this door as our messenger. I'd wait for Mom to be asleep, then tape a note on it, reminding her to please find and initial both my and Eli's report cards in the morning before she went to work.

Written communication was easier, safer than telling her in person, which risked unleashing her moods, no matter how softly I tried to put it. I knew she got upset because she knew it was her fault –how could it be mine? – but still.

"Relax, Judy. I'm almost ready."

Years after Bonimart, on the first day of second grade, a woman knocked on my classroom door and asked me to grab my bag and come with her. I'd turned red. Had Zaidy died? I shook as I gathered my items and stepped out in front of 25 staring students, only to be taken to the library where Eli was reading a book. Apparently, my parents had been late in paying tuition – again – and we were not allowed to stay in our classrooms. From then on, I spent each August anxiously leaving notes, pleading with Mom and Dad to pay for the upcoming year, which would never happen until the last minute.

Then again, I'm not sure what I expected from parents who couldn't decide on my name for three months, each petitioning for the labels of their own relatives who'd died horrific deaths in murder-camps and blood-soaked countrysides, my title flipping between Cheryl, Celia, and Rebecca until a compromise was struck: Judith (means Jewish girl—neutral) followed by a series of middle names from each side commemorating various atrocities. Three months! Why would I expect anything different?

> I'd have to walk across the sanctuary by myself, my bangs clammy, my family's dysfunction glowing neon.

But then I saw her. In a slip. Still sitting at her desk, writing, her hefty frame resting too comfortably on her brown cushioned swivel seat. Not. Going. Anywhere.

I expected something different because this was my bat mitzvah. I felt the door swing behind me, connections unhinged, wild breeze on my back. Not a store, or a puppet show. My bat mitzvah. A night different from all other nights. A chill ran along my damp skin. A slick of papers slid off one of the dozens of folders on her bed.

"Mom." No answer. "Mom?" What are you thinking? Why are you doing this to me? Where are you?

"Dad." I ran to the den. "We have to go."

"Don't look at me," he grumbled, hidden behind the papers. He was ensconced in the room, planted in his chair, yet seemed detached from it all, like a realist figure set in a cartoon painting. I knew this lateness wasn't his fault. She was the artist, he was the scientist. She was a hippie, he was what hippies rebelled against. He was always on time, early even, but forever being coupled with late- comers. Jack was always late, he used to tell the story of his best friend with whom he'd traveled the world. The plane would be taking off – TAKING OFF – and Jack would run up to the gate, dragging his suitcase. It was a compulsion, a need to squeeze out every second and use it twice, to trick the clock and conquer time. We once climbed Mount Sinai. Jack insisted on finding the exact spot where God talked to Moses. Then he dumped orange peels right there. On the spot where God handed Moses the ten commandments! And, of course, we missed the guided climb down. Dad laughed. He never laughed at Mom's lateness. But he also never left without her.

"We need to be there in 28 minutes," I said.

"I'm ready," Dad said. I know, I rolled my eyes.

I couldn't take it any longer. If we didn't leave in one minute I didn't see how it could happen. I'd have to walk across the sanctuary by myself, my bangs clammy, my family's dysfunction glowing neon. I held back tears. My insides burned, my stomach coiling in on itself. "Mom!" I screamed.

"For God's sake, Judy," she yelled back. "I'm coming."

But when I reached her threshold, she was still in her slip, at her desk.

"How could you?" was all I said, before sprinting down the hallway, into the vestibule, and right out the front door.

I didn't really run.

In my fantasies, of course, I fled. I dreamt of galloping across intersections, speeding through the city. I imagined racing down highways in European cars, jet-setting to the Florida Keys, surrounded by a different family. But that day, I did not run, because the synagogue was far, and I wasn't sure how to get there, and also, I didn't want to take the bus alone to my bat mitzvah. I wanted to go to my bat mitzvah with my mother.

"Ay, let's go," Dad called in the direction of Mom's room. Even his forfeiture had its limits. Always, there would come one moment when he would suddenly realize how odd it was, how wronged he felt. Anger was tucked inside him like toy streamers buried in a box, building pressure. Then the lid would fly open and the strands would spiral out and attack everything, hissing like snakes. "Let's get the f--k out of here."

"Don't hound me," she yelled. "F--k you."

I cringed, relieved that my father was taking action, yet bracing myself for more yelling. I checked on Eli, who was OK, folded into his Game Boy. Pants on.

The method worked, and Mom emerged bedecked in Poison, pearls, and a purple dress. On top of her head, I saw, was a doily, the fragile, intricate covering that indicated a woman's married state, loosely fastened with a bobby pin to her hair, which was thinning, while her body was thickening. Mom knew I was guarding her and we didn't speak. She slowly made her way down the front stairs to the new Pontiac, tan, with bucket seats and electric windows. We all clicked our seat belts and the engine started and I looked at the digital green clock flashing, and my heart pounded and I knew there was a chance that Dad would drive crazy fast and drop me before he parked and that I would make it by a hair of a fraction of an instant, and then Mom said, "I told Bubbie we'd pick her up."

That's when I zoned out. It was too late. The math was impossible. Strapped in my brown seat belt, trapped in this Pontiac, I surrendered to the clock, squeezed my cue cards and squinted my lids until the green numbers became blurry, nonsensical. I closed my eyes and retreated inward, exiting time, to a fantasy world of kitchens neat and white like the crescent of my French manicure, imagining the moments between every second inflating, imagining myself softly slipping into the Mississippi, time melting around my limbs, warm and wet, washing over the discord between my mother's world and the social contract that I now saw was quickly growing too great, too confusing.

Strapped in my brown seat belt, trapped in this Pontiac, I surrendered to the clock, squeezed my cue cards and squinted my lids until the green numbers became blurry, nonsensical.

Dad sped, and as we pulled up to the synagogue with Bubbie in tow, and I saw the stairs littered in loitering, overdressed relatives who did not look like they'd been anxiously waiting for the final crazy bat mitzvah girl, I was once again able to breathe. The almost-summer sun was sharp, each guest's shadow crisp and dark against the jagged architecture. The tree-lined street looked particularly green, itching with verdancy.

"So she's here," a great-uncle said as I loped to the lobby. "Fashionably late," teased another, ruffling my now disastrous hair with his tobacco-reeking palms.

When I got inside, it was chaos. People were everywhere, in the hall, in the reception room putting out place cards. I tried not to notice that a large percentage of the attendees comprised my disgruntled Yiddish relations who were drenched in anxiety and knock-off Drakkar Noir, high from endless discussions about their bowel movements.

"You see"—my mother came up behind me—"I told you, you didn't need to worry."

"I have to go," I said.

I found my teacher and joined the group's formation. I only hoped my father was back from parking the car as the organ music began and we all proceeded down the central aisle of the sanctuary. I then sat down on the stage, finally able to be nervous about what I really should have been nervous about all along.

"Passover . . . the cycle . . . the egg." Each of my words rang out through speakers altered – rich and textured – as if whole symphonies were braided together in my syllables. I heard my own sounds, wanted to squeeze them in my fists. The Angel of Death, the sacrifice. I spoke these solid words to a sea of smiles, bobbing heads, to kippahs and dye jobs. And, to my shock, I loved it. One-on-one I would have choked, but up there I was the confident centre of attention. I controlled time. My voice, my tempo, even my silences, marked the passing of tenses, focused everyone's experience and shifted their states. Each second felt stretched out like caramel, like I could lick every side of it.

"On Passover we celebrate the fall of the Egyptian empire. Which never really surprised me. What kind of regime puts the Jews in charge of manual labour?" A burst of guffaws and applause. I could live right here, forever. In my cadence, I heard my dad, his shtick, his humour mantra: it's all in the timing.

It was Dad who'd helped me re-enter Bonimart, pushing me, each week, to take one additional step into the store. (His 12-step program, he joked.) He'd hold my hand as my turquoise faux-Reebok lifted off the linoleum, and while my leg dangled in the air, he'd point out that I hadn't been crushed or trapped. You're fine! Then I'd plant my toes down and feel the hard ground beneath me, holding me up.

"Thank you," I said to the audience, my speech complete. I glanced up at the applauding crowd, but unlike a movie scene, I did not lock eyes with a widely smiling, wildly nodding, crying-tears-of-joy parent. Into the anonymous blur, however, I held my gaze firm. For a moment, I sensed—albeit hazily—a future, the possibility of being alone in the world, and surviving. ■

I saw a Zaida...with a little boy

MARVIN HERSHORN

Loss is an inevitable part of change...of life
You pay a very heavy price for change
Even if it is necessary, change and pain are an integral part
Of life's palette, sometimes things cannot be said
That's life's unwritten rules...the loss of two hearts
The loss of a hug, a kiss or a smile...the mussing of hair
The high five, reaching down, holding hands while walking
I saw a Zaida on our crescent, walking with his grandchild
They were studying the rainbow of tulips
Planted in the center of the crescent
The Zaida looked old and tired, life worn... but with an angelic smile
He was bald, with close cropped white hair
He appeared to be warm, avuncular, eponymous, wise
He had that beautiful little boy...the ultimate happiness
He wore a traditional kippah, perhaps a deep dyed misogyny
His grandchild danced around the flowers in a child-like dance
A dervish whirlwind with proximity of being there...the Zaida kvelled
I am a Zaida too...without a little boy
My throat is full of glass shards
In the darkest of grandparenthood without a light
Perhaps geography challenged or subterranean reasons
I fail to understand...The great equalizer, like a ghost ship
That can never anchor, as aging is a non-stop inequity
A chronological mode turning faster than car wheels
With the passing years buttressed with resilience and perseverance
We must shed our protective layers and reveal
Our vulnerability, our sadness, our pain and even humiliation
Impermeable as reinforced concrete,
Know who you are, love who you are...
Perhaps one day I will be...
The Zaida in the crescent

One tiny angel's hand, by some design,
Now firmly clasps and gently steadies mine.
Two baby arms, once reaching up in hope,

The healing laughter takes away my pain,
Along with other reasons to complain.

A gift with unexpected dividend.
From child to man and now my dearest friend,
His deep and rumbling voice, once like a bell,
First answered Torah's call, and answered well.

I blinked. A canopy appeared above
A perfect son joined with his perfect love.
Then, soon the time was right to satisfy
The call to dutifully multiply.

Beloved angel cheeks for me to kiss,
Awaken all my shameless prejudice.
Sweet miracles, that bless my life with joy,
Began with one delicious baby boy.

Though daily there's a little less of me,
I gaze into each precious face and see . . . Eternity.

Is this the little girl I carried...

JACQUELINE MARKOWITZ

By Thursday morning I went into my youngest daughter's room. She is home between adventures. It's 7 a.m. Phone alarm singing. Of course she doesn't hear it. I quietly nudge, whisper wakes ups, and then rub her back. Purrs as if she's a kitten. I stroke her head. Steeped in a drowsy tranquility. This doesn't happen often anymore. The morning can wait. I look at my hand twirling her tangle of curls. It looks like my mother's hand. I see some brown spots.

My eldest daughter is at the hospital waiting for labour to begin. Her first child. I'm going to be a grandmother. I remember holding her in my arms. Tick tock, the hands of the clock, gingham rocking horses, round and round, rhymes, prom dresses, butterfly kisses. Raindrop tears, hers and mine, over the years. A river flows between us.

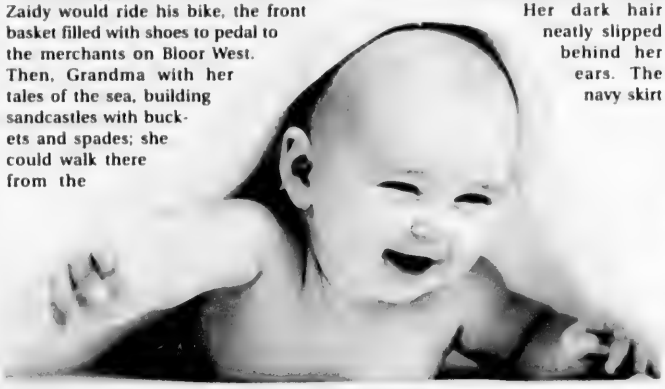
My middle daughter is sleeping in the room next door. This too is a moment. She doesn't live at home. I go in to say good morning. Light coming through the childhood curtain, single little bed, still the ruffled white linens. A ladybug is crawling across the cover. Like a picture in a storybook.

We waited. The baby came after eight in the evening. Morning to night. Life changes. Love happens. Something shifts. A miracle. He rests his perfect tiny hand on my daughter's chest. She can no longer remember a life without her son. Life begins again.

I am holding my first grandchild. A boy. Named for my mother-in-law, Julia and my mother, Leah - Julian Lee, his Hebrew name, Yehuda, in honour of my father-in-law. My daughter named for my father Harry and my brother John. L'dor v'dor. This is what we do. We remember. We continue.

My grandson is named after the three grandparents who adored my daughter. It was a mutual love. Hand in hand, they would go off to discover adventures on big screens, to bookshops, and to dine at a fancy table with oversized chairs, her feet barely touching the ground, and twirls of fettuccine Alfredo wound deliciously on the fork. There would be stories about the magic village of Toronto with houses that snuggled side by side, and how Zaidy would ride his bike, the front basket filled with shoes to pedal to the merchants on Bloor West. Then, Grandma with her tales of the sea, building sandcastles with buckets and spades; she could walk there from the house with the pretty wainscoting and panes of leaded glass windows, before we came on the big ship to Canada. Milky tea in flowered cups, and biscuits to dip and catch on her tongue. These are the gentle tendrils of a love that resides in our hearts.

I am relaxing in the oversized nursery chair. He is sleeping in my arms. His tiny fingers clasped around mine. I remember my mother holding my daughter when she was born. Her baby's baby. How aware she must have been of the time past and the time left in front of her. How old will she be at her bat mitzvah? Will she see her marry? Is this the little girl I carried... The vintage loveseat recovered in a canvas with peach brush strokes was in my bedroom, and the sun filtered through the slats of the blinds. Her dark hair neatly slipped behind her ears. The navy skirt skimmed just below her knees. She never wore pants until she was in her 80s. Her ankles crossed, lovely posture, her blouse tucked in just so. I can still see the tenderness. I smiled at her. She looked at me. I can feel her watching over us now. She is behind me, her hand resting on my shoulder.



On Shabbat I light the candles. Two in the tall silver sticks from Bubby that had stood in her home majestically alongside the kiddush cup one of the girls brought them back from Israel, the tzedakah box, and the one delicately painted porcelain shoe. I also light the beautiful antique candlesticks, which were a wedding gift from my brother. And, then, I light three candles in the candelabra that always sat in the centre of the table at my mother's home. I close my eyes. I feel her hands over mine. We say the blessing together. The maternal choir. We remember. We continue.

Friday evening we gathered for dinner around my daughter's table. Her new home looks like the dollhouse she played with as a child. The one we built together, cross-legged on the floor, putting the little flowers in the window boxes, setting up the nursery, and rocking the miniature cradle. Shabbat. She lights the little brass candelabra embellished with tiny doors that open like an arc to the blessings. It came with Grandma to Canada, and has now found its way home. We share challah, and drink sweet wine. Welcome to family, little boy. Look at what can happen in a day. What we can create. How life begins again. How much we can love. ■

Lest we ever forget

MASHA RUTITSKY

There are special days of the year
The memorial days, lest we forget,
We remember all those who are
To our hearts dear,
We remember the terrible past lest we regret.

The memorial candles remind us
Of the flames of Inquisition,
The memorial candles remind us
Of the appalling crimes of the Holocaust,
Of the times when being a Jew was a prohibition,
And the six million Jews who perished,
It was such a terrible cost.

How many kids, like myself, never knew their relatives,
Whose lives had been taken before their times?
How many kids, like myself, never knew grandparents,
Never shared mutual love or saw their smiles?

All we can do now is remember the beautiful souls.
For them we light the memorial candles
Lest we non-action regret.
It is our good deeds that our hearts console,
It is our grandchildren with ancestors' names
Lest the past we ever forget.

Love with respect

ALVIN ABRAM

In our youth, our lifespan so many years away,
We gazed at each other, vowing never to stray.
We were in love – it was too obvious not to see,
Our bodies were one, our hearts set free.
Yet, what is love without each other's respect?
What are promises, when pursuing one disaffects?
What use are goals, if both won't support?
What good are plans if one decides to abort?
No love can last forever – respect must always be there.
Throughout the pain of life, only respect will care.
As time passes, uniting our lives together longer,
Love with respect will make the bond stronger.
And when the flame of life begins to cool the fire,
The candle in our hearts will glow ever higher.
For when all is said and done – as you would expect
What has survived is love with respect.

We would like to take this opportunity to wish all of our patients, family and friends a healthy and happy Passover. And may we see peace in Israel and around the world.

Mima Cha Tzura

SELINA APPLEBY

My mother and I went to visit her aunt, my great-aunt Cha Tzura, who lived in a home in the Kensington Market where the sights and sounds scared the bejesus out of me. This was the Jewish city market where the chickens were caged, to be bought alive and slaughtered at your leisure, and the fish swam free in the tanks. There was a special cheese store with mountains of cheese piled up high. The store-keepers' aprons jangled with pockets of coins and exotic smells of spices filled the air.

This trip was planned by my mother in order to visit her aunt who was in failing health and lived alone. Nothing prepared me for the sight of this wizened gnome. She wore a beaten brown felt cap pulled down over her ears and a faded, shapeless house dress and flat, broken-down shoes. She was bent over and her pale, watery eyes once spunky, were now deflated. She lived next to a synagogue so she could pray several times a day. Her Bible was her only friend.

When my mother presented her with a tray of food, she wanted to reciprocate. Looking helplessly around the room to find a gift for me, she settled on her clenched handkerchief. Inside she pulled out a penny and offered it to me. It was hot and damp. Since they spoke in Yiddish I understood very little but the one thing I did understand was the pain of being old and living alone.

She was waiting to die and since there was no one to talk to, she found solace at the synagogue. There, she said, she was talking to God and He understood. ■

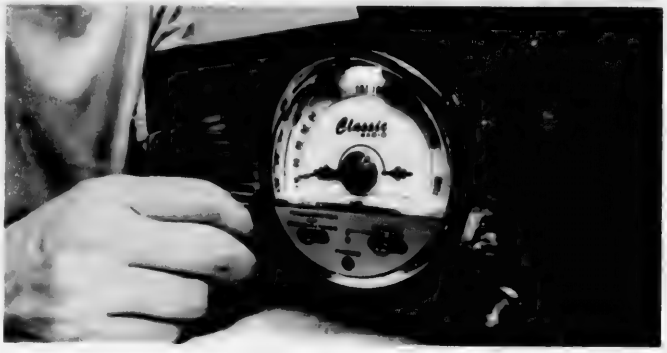
40 Years

WHERE QUALITY AND CONSISTENCY MAKE THE DIFFERENCE

The contest

ALVIN ABRAM



We had been married 25 years, and every year I had sent Marilyn a mushy card in February because it was expected of me. It was not a Jewish holiday but a day to renew one's vows of love. The mushy cards said sweet words I personally could never utter, and I received hugs and kisses for my paper affection. For the next five years ago, I impulsively sent Marilyn a dozen red roses to her office at York University.

I was at a loss as to what to give now? While driving, I heard the radio announcer promoting a poetry contest for Valentine's Day; the winner would receive an all-expense paid weekend for two at a resort in Muskoka, which is Ontario's prime cottage country. The runners-up would receive boxes of truffles. The contest called for entrants to compose an original poem about love, the winning selections to be read on the radio the night before Valentine's Day.

I decided to enter the contest, hoping to win a box of truffles. I didn't tell Marilyn what I intended to do. After all, if my entry was not selected, I could buy her something at the last minute, and my whim would remain my secret.

For several days, I agonized over a poem, writing and rewriting until I was sorry I'd become involved. It would be easier to buy a box of truffles than try to win a prize in a contest in which God knows how many poems would be entered. Finally satisfied with my efforts, I faxed the poem to the radio station and waited for the night of the program.

While I was secretly agonizing over the poem, Marilyn asked, "Are you going to send me flowers again?"

"Nope," I replied.

She gave me a hard look. "Why?" she asked.

"'Cause you expect it. It no longer gives you the message I want."

"Going to send me a mushy card?" The tone in her voice oozed with promises to come.

"Nope."

"What?"

I smiled mischievously. "I'm not going to tell you, so don't ask any more questions." And that was how I left it.

Periodically Marilyn would ask, "Are you sure about the flowers?"

"No flowers," I said.

"None?"

"None."

On the night of the contest, I had put in a long day at work and was having difficulty keeping awake. The reading of the winning poems was to start at 11 p.m., but long before that, I had difficulty keeping my eyes open.

"Why don't you go to bed, dear?" Marilyn said.

"Was I snoring?"

"That's one way of putting it."

My watch read 9:03. "Goodnight," I said, and trudged up the stairs to our bedroom. I set my alarm clock for 10:55, intending to sneak into the basement to listen to the program. It was possible to make it from my bedroom to the basement without anyone being aware I was there. I undressed, climbed into bed and fell asleep before my head hit the pillow.

When the alarm went off, I sprang from the bed and headed for the stairs without putting on my robe. For a heavy person, I had difficulty moving lightly. Just as I made it to the bottom of the stairs, I met Marilyn coming up to check on me.

"Where're you going?" Marilyn asked as I tried to pass her.

"Downstairs. I forgot something."

"What?"

"Something." I glanced at my watch; it was 11:05. "I'll tell you later," I said, and rushed to the basement door before she could utter another word, opened it and flew down the steps. I scrambled around the furniture to the radio, and tuned in the station.

Music was playing.

It was now 11:10.

I had missed part of the program.

The music ended and the announcer went into his patter. The volume from the radio began to warble and the announcer's voice faded. I fiddled with the dial, trying to regain the sound, but I could only catch the odd word. He was reading a poem. They were not my words.

Again music played, and the full volume returned for a few minutes, only to fade again. I strained to hear what the announcer was saying, but the volume went from hard to hear to impossible to hear. The situation turned critical. It was now 11:25 and the radio had become dumb with silence.

I dropped to my hands and knees, placed my ear against the speaker and faintly heard the announcer reading another poem. It was not mine. My back ached from my ridiculous position, forcing me to straighten myself. The announcer's voice became inaudible.

Marilyn called. "Hon, can you come upstairs?" There was a short pause before she added, "Please."

I didn't answer. I had bent down again, ear against the radio, concentrating on the words coming from the silent radio.

"Alvin. Come upstairs right now."

I was unable to leave the radio for fear I would miss the announcer reading my poem (I hoped). "I can't come up now. Give me a minute. I have to listen to the radio," I shouted back.

Marilyn called again. "Alvin, the police are here!"

"Who?"

"The police are here," she repeated, emphasizing each word.

I willed the radio to stop warbling, but it refused to cooperate.

"Alvin!"

I gave the radio a dirty look, struggled to my feet, raced up the stairs, flew through the door and stopped before two tall, well-built policemen. They looked down at me with their stern, official faces. I felt small even though I am six-three and weigh three hundred pounds. Perspiration leaked from my forehead and droplets of moisture from my neck dripped down my chest. Gazing up at them, in my baby-blue pyjamas and bare feet, my hair in a state of shock from not being combed, I wished I could disappear. "Yes, can I help you?" I said with as much dignity as I could muster.

"Dear," Marilyn cooed, "they're here in response to the burglar alarm you set off."

> The situation turned critical. It was now 11:25 and the radio had become dumb with silence.

"What burglar alarm? We don't have any burglar system. They're coming tomorrow."

"The security company came a day early," Marilyn said, her face flushed with embarrassment. "They were in the neighbourhood, so they decided to do ours, but forgot a cut-off switch. They told me not to go into the basement until they returned tomorrow, because the system was activated, and opening the door would automatically trigger a response at the police station that was monitoring this area."

I looked at my watch. "I don't believe this," I mumbled. "Officers," I said to the policemen, trying to look professional in my night attire, "obviously I must live here, otherwise why would I be wearing pyjamas? I'm sorry about the alarm, but as you just heard, I wasn't informed that the security system was installed. Had I known about the door, I wouldn't be running around at this ungodly hour trying to listen to a radio that doesn't work."

One of the officers tried to say something, but I edged towards the basement door. "This must look odd to you, but I'm caught in a ridiculous situation and I've got to go back downstairs.

Please accept my apologies." I turned to Marilyn and pleaded. "Marilyn, tell them I'm not crazy."

Marilyn's eyes had grown, her mouth opened and she pointed her finger at me, jabbing at the air as I backed away. "Your pyjamas," she mouthed. I looked down and realized the front had come undone and I was partially exposed. I clutched at the opening and disappeared down the stairs, raced over to the radio, threw myself onto the floor and jammed my ear against the speaker. I barely heard the announcer, catching a word here and there – words from my poem. Impatient with the radio, I scrambled to my feet and raced up the stairs, my fist gripping the top of my pyjamas to prevent them from opening. The police officers were saying good night to Marilyn as I passed them, and I could see one officer look at the other with puzzlement and concern.

Like a tank, I thudded up the steps, dragged my tired body into my bedroom and turned on the clock radio. It was already tuned to the station, and with clarity of sound I heard the announcer wish everyone a good night and express the hope that the winners would enjoy their prizes. I sank to the floor and began to moan.

"What's going on?"

I didn't answer. I just looked at her with glazed eyes, my head shaking from side to side.

"What's going on?" Marilyn repeated.

"You wouldn't believe me if I told you."

"Try me. The policeman wanted to know if he should stick around until a doctor showed up. I told him this was normal. Now start talking or I'll call them back."

I told her everything. The look on Marilyn's face changed from annoyance to utter disbelief. When I finished, she was the one shaking her head and rolling her eyes. As the shock wore off, I knew what her next words would be, and as she started to speak, I mimed them. "Did you win the truffles?"

"I don't know! I don't expect there's anyone at the switchboard at this hour, so we'll have to wait until tomorrow to find out. But the words I heard sounded like my poem and I figure maybe we won something." I stressed the word we.

"I'm going to call now," Marilyn said. She looked up the radio station's number in the telephone book and dialed. When she hung up, she said, "Answering machine."

I was standing in the middle of the room, looking like the conclusion of the Rocky Horror Picture Show. "I'm going to bed. I'm too tired to think. I'll call the radio station in the morning and find out who the winners were." I then dragged my exhausted body towards the bed. Marilyn grabbed my pyjama top, my eyes already closed, and I felt her kiss on my lips.

I opened my eyes. "What's that for?"

"For the thought. Good night – I love you." She was smiling as I toppled into the bed.

The next morning, early, my office telephone rang and a sweet voice asked for Alvin Abram.

"Speaking."

"Congratulations. Your poem was judged number one in our contest and you won the grand prize of a weekend at Deerhurst."

I was stunned. I could not speak.

"Sir, are you there?" she asked. "Aren't you pleased?"

"Lady," I finally answered, "if I told you what happened to me last night, you wouldn't believe it." Next year, I'm gonna buy my wife flowers. ■

The antidote

HAROLD PUPKO

After thoroughly reviewing the medical chart, Dr. Solomon Teyku strutted with an air of confidence from the nursing station towards Nissim Fresserman's room in the hospital's surgical ward. The strutting was in defiance of the fact that Dr. Teyku suffered from Imposter Syndrome, a gnawing sense of inadequacy despite significant professional accomplishment. Dr. Teyku tried to convince himself that, by successfully managing the first patient of his career as a newly-certified psychiatrist, he could set himself on the road to his own recovery.

He ignored the chuckles from the nurses who had cautioned him that his cross-cultural sensitivity training might prove lacking in dealing with the self-described "Jew in room 302."

Upon entering the room, Dr. Teyku was somewhat surprised to find a stereotypical Jewish patient in his rural hospital, but reminded himself that modifying expectations is one of the goals of psychiatry, and so, he carried on.

The only intimate knowledge that Dr. Teyku had about Jews was that which he had gained from his Jewish friends during his medical residency.

"What could go wrong?" he thought to himself. "I love Jewish food."

Dr. Teyku's Jewish friends had given him the impression that Judaism was all about the food, especially holiday food. He was soon to discover a new dimension to that cliché.

"Hello, I am Dr. Teyku. I am a psychiatrist. Your surgeon, Dr. Komos, asked me to stop by for a chat. Do you understand why he might have suggested that?"

Nissim Fresserman was in an irritable mood.

"It's all my mother's fault," grumbled Nissim.

"I see," replied Dr. Teyku, sensing a potential wealth of psychotherapeutic opportunities.

"And why is that?"

"Because she married my father," answered Nissim with a smirk.

Dr. Teyku heard cash registers kachinging is his head. He resisted the urge to immediately offer Nissim a business card for his private psychoanalytic practice.

"I see. And why was that a mistake for your mother?"

"She should have married her own kind, but no, she decided to marry an Ashkenazi guy, and I have had to suffer every year on Passover because of that. What kind of woman doesn't consider her children's potential future suffering before making such decisions?"

Dr. Teyku was lost.

"I'm sorry, I don't understand what you are saying, but perhaps we should limit our discussion to what is happening to you right now.

"It says in your chart that you were found wandering the streets before you collapsed. Yet it also says that you had pain for hours before collapsing. Any reason you didn't call 9-1-1 earlier?"

"My cell phone was in the closet. I couldn't get to it. I don't have a land line."

"Was the closet locked? Did you lose the key?"

"No, it wasn't locked. Unfortunately, I left my phone in the closet with the chametz that I sold before Passover. Chametz are the foods that are forbidden on Passover. They either have to be destroyed before Passover, or they can be gathered in one place and sold to a non-Jew. So, it was forbidden for me to trespass into that non-Jew's closet, and even more forbidden for me to even look in the closet just in case I saw the chametz within my property."

"What would happen if you saw the chametz?" Teyku asked with a sense of befuddlement.

Fresserman grimaced and replied:

"The worst thing that can happen to a Jew: karet! "

"Karet: the end of my soul's connection to 3,000 years of its heritage. I can't even begin to imagine that horror!!"

Dr. Teyku began formulating a diagnosis. Mother issues, father issues, neurosis bordering on psychosis. He understood enough to understand that Nissim did not sound like a mentally healthy man.

Dr. Teyku began formulating a diagnosis. Mother issues, father issues, neurosis bordering on psychosis.

"OK, I think we can postpone talking about the horror. Could you describe what you were doing the day that you collapsed?"

"It was the fourth day of Passover. Passover is supposed to be a holiday to enjoy the delights of springtime, but it was freezing cold outside, and raining too. My family went back to the city, and I was stuck here alone in cottage country, with not much to do. So I started to binge-watch Netflix. And I was getting hungry, so I started munching on matzah. By the end of the second box, I wasn't feeling well. I was already constipated for days. That didn't help."

Dr. Teyku smelled a psychiatric opening.

"I see. So you were binging on Netflix and food. Do you have a tendency towards impulsivity and poor self-control? Alcohol, for example?

"Yeah, I had four cups of wine for two nights in a row," playfully replied Nissim.

Dr. Teyku duly noted the indulgence.

"Do you understand how you ended up in surgery?"

"Yeah, apparently the matzah got stuck and formed a ball that eventually turned into a stone-like substance that couldn't be budged by any means other than surgery. Dr. Komos called it a bezoar. He told me that bezoars were at one time considered to have magical properties, that they were useful as antidotes to poisons. So it looks like I produced a magical healing substance with my own body. I have the power to heal. Feeling a little jealous, Dr. Teyku?"

Dr. Teyku added narcissistic grandiosity to the list of observations and continued his probing.

"You mentioned that you had a problem with constipation. Is that a regular problem for you?"

"Ha-ha doc. Very punny. Regular. You think I'm anal? Let me tell you, for the past six months, ever since I became a vegetarian, I have had beautiful bowel movements, sometimes two or three a day. But come Passover, my mother issues plugged me up."

Dr. Teyku treaded carefully.

"Please explain."

Nissim elaborated.

"On Passover, it is forbidden for a subset of Jews to eat from a class of foods called kitniyot. This illogical list of the forbidden includes peas, beans, lentils, corn, peanuts: the list goes on and on. Those were the foods that I was thriving on.

People from my mother's Sephardi background are permitted to eat those foods, but because she married a man from a different culture, she and her children had to take on his culture's traditions of not eating kitniyot. And why are these foods forbidden? Only God knows. Some overprotective Ashkenazic rabbis, beginning in the 13th century, became so afraid of people suffering from karet that they started making up bizarre rules about kitniyot to protect our souls. And they haven't stopped in the hundreds of years since.

My family on my father's side are descendants of one of those rabbis, the Shvertzuzeiner Rebbe. He was stringent in his teachings about kitniyot and also forbade gebrokt, which is the mixing of broken matzo in any form with water, for fear of it turning into a chametz-like substance. He even taught that drinking water with matzo was forbidden, and I guess subconsciously, that teaching stuck with me, even though I think it is ridiculous. Yet, for some bizarre reason, he allowed eating gebrokt on the eighth day of Passover, but we could only eat it from special dishes. On a special tablecloth. White, of course.

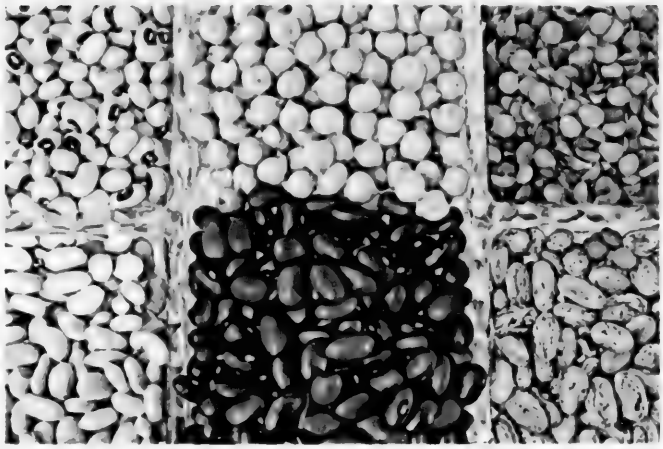
Even my mother's family tradition was affected by the folly of kitniyot. Her people are permitted to eat chickpeas and sesame seeds, but are forbidden to eat them ground up together as hummus. Why, you ask? Because it sounds like chametz. What do you make of all of that, Dr. Psychiatrist?"

"On your father's side, severe obsessiveness. On your mother's side, a clear looseness of association. Classic formula for psychosis," Dr. Teyku thought to himself, while trying to maintain a professional sense of detached composure.

Dr. Teyku remained silent, and nodded to allow Nissim to continue.

Nissim started to get angry.

"My heart breaks knowing that the Temple of Jewish Law is collapsing under its own weight, and God is getting buried in the rubble. Contradictory and illogical rules do not bring people closer to God. Instead, they potentially lead people astray, or even worse, they can lead to madness. MADNESS!!!"



Suddenly, Nissim observed Dr Teyku's face started to change.

His nose turned into a cob of corn. His eyes turned into kidney beans, his eyebrows, sesame seeds. His hair turned into buckwheat. Teyku's upper lip became a green bean, his lower lip, a snap pea. From those lips, hummus began dripping into a beard composed of tofu peppered with lentils. Dr. Teyku's face was turning into a kitniyot-themed Arcimboldo painting before Nissim's terrified eyes.

Nissim's visual experience made him wonder if his disrupted connection to reality was a prelude to a darker disconnection, that of karet. However, he could not understand what he may have done to bring that about. He did not eat any chametz during Passover. Suddenly, he became suspicious that there was some chametz in the narcotics that his surgeon still allowed him to liberally self-administer post-operatively through an intravenous pump.

"Dr Teyku, you are a psychiatrist, a healer of souls. Am I losing my soul?"

Dr. Teyku calmly responded.

"Nissim, let us try to gain some perspective on your problem. You have a fear of karet, the disintegration of the essential connections of your soul. What is the opposite of karet? It is that state of being where the connections of your soul are all integrated as one. Your ancestors playfully called this state keter, rearranging the Hebrew letters k, r and t of the word karet and manipulating the vowels. Likewise, by rearranging your thoughts and emotions, you may find yourself closer to keter than karet. So, as you indicated to me earlier, it is true, you do have healing powers within you. My prescription for your soul is that you strive to find within yourself the capacity for love and compassion, which is the path to keter.

Nissim, I feel your pain. Nothing is as whole as a broken heart, but through such pain one can find the wholeness of healing. Rules should be soft and firm so that they can sustain you, like a nice piece of bread, not rigid and breakable like a dry piece of matzo.

Here is a simple rule from your ancestors that may take you a lifetime to master: love the stranger, love your neighbour and love yourself, and in doing so you may find love for your God. Love the rabbis, whose misguided love for your soul got you into your present predicament. Remind them of vox populi, the power of the people to change Jewish law, as they did by refusing to accept potatoes as kitniyot.

Eat kitniyot, not just for your physical health, but for your psychological and spiritual health. Eat them in a mindful state of holiness, remembering the big picture of the Passover message. Celebrate Passover, a Temple-based holiday, as they did in the times of the Temple, when kitniyot was not even a figment of the rabbinic imagination. Re-learn to love the power of imagination. And by the way, always drink plenty of fluids when you eat matzo."

Nissim was perplexed.

"You clearly aren't Jewish, yet you seem wiser than Solomon. How can I trust that the truth in your words is real?"

Dr. Teyku grinned.

"It is true. I am not Jewish. In fact, I am not even real. All is an illusion, including the illusion that all is an illusion."

And with that, Dr. Solomon Teyku vanished in a puff of smoke.

And through that smoke emerged the whisper of a still, small voice. It came from a well-dressed man carrying a clipboard.

"Hello, I am Dr. Elijah Gogel-Mogel. I am a psychiatrist. Dr. Komos asked me to speak to you. Is that alright with you?"

"What happened to Dr. Teyku?" asked Nissim.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Fresserman. There is no Dr. Teyku on staff at this hospital. But I am prepared to attempt to handle any conflicts that might be troubling you, including any 'Teyku' issues that you might have. Shall we begin?" ■

Memory

DONNA SEIDMAN

I was only 1 year old when the Second War broke out and spread all over the world.
My mother, my father and brother too they were killed by German Nazis member and I was left with life and memory to remember.
Not far from Krakow I was hidden in a village under beds or in the barn and I did not know why it has to be like that.
I cried only quiet, so no one could hear and I was very happy if I got something to eat.
I survived the war but the more I grew up I miss my mother and father, never got a kiss or a hug.
Never got anyone to help me when I need help and I had to solve my problems and make the best of that.
When I made my son's bar mitzvah or walked them under the chupah I was wishing that I had my parents to share with me these simchahs.
Now I am mother and grandmother and I tell my children the same whatever they have to do something they should be proud of them.
They know that I am a Holocaust survivor and my childhood was hard
But I always had lots of courage to function through my life.

I have not spoken with You

(for Sam)

PER BRASK

I have not spoken with You for so long
I had almost forgotten You submerged in my inner sea spinning a vortex of my small desires until - in a gasp - I remembered it is Your breath that sustains the world
Your breath that generates all that is so none of us is alone
all is connected despair obliged me to reconnect or to drown and for the choice I thank You and for now knowing that gratitude can keep me afloat and close to Your hovering breath

"I lied to you."

His grandmother's desire to be honest with him was not helping her cause. He had hated her all these years, and although she was now in the last few days of her life, lying in a hospital bed, he could not feel any pity for her. His parents had died in the war, in Europe. His father had been killed in battle, and shortly after that his mother had been killed by disease. He was two when they died. No brothers, no sisters. Just him and his grandmother. When the war ended, his grandmother immigrated with him to Canada, and she raised him by herself. He could not remember anything from that time in Europe, but he certainly remembered his early years in Canada. Although he was now 57 years old he continually felt bitterness when he remembered how his grandmother had raised him.

"Daniel, I lied to you. I lied to you about how your mother died. I know it was a horrible thing to do, but I need to tell you why I did it. I need you to know what really happened to your mother. I am not asking for forgiveness. I just need you to know the true story."

The years of growing up in a home where there was never any laughter were very hard on him. He thought when he had moved out on his own as a young adult that his life would change, that he would be happy, and that laughter would finally be an important part of his life. But that just didn't happen. He could not change what he felt inside, and although he wanted to feel what it was like to cry from laughter, it seemed impossible to overcome a mind that was at war with feeling joy.

It was his grandmother's fault, he felt, that after all these years he could not recover from a childhood that had been filled with sadness. She was not kind to him. Although she never hit him, or hurt him with words, she damaged him by her aloofness, by her inability to hug him and tell him how much he was loved. There was a strangeness in their relationship. He had always sensed that something was very wrong. That strangeness had haunted him all the time he was growing up.

His grandmother's voice, though, was very unusual now. This was a tone he had never heard. Her desperation to be honest with him was palpable, and although he decided that he would listen, he still could not feel any attachment towards her. Knowing that there was a lie that she had hidden from him all these years wasn't going to help him feel any warmer towards her.

" What do you want to tell me? What's the lie about my mother that you now have to end?"

"Your mother didn't die from disease. She was murdered."

Daniel's grandmother searched his face for his reaction, expecting to see shock or surprise but all she could see was impassiveness. If this news was hurting him she could see no evidence in his expression.

"What difference does it make?" Daniel replied. "She's dead and it happened a long time ago. It's not going to change my life. It's not going to change how you raised me. I don't know why you couldn't have told me the truth before now. You know what? I'm sorry you're dying but I'm not sorry for what I've felt about you all these years. In fact, I think I have even less respect for you now. You were always so cold to me. And now I find out that you're a liar. You're a disgusting woman."

"Daniel, I told you, I don't want forgiveness. I should have told you what happened to your mother a long time before this, but I didn't, and it's time for me to correct a wrong. So please let me tell you."

Daniel stared at her briefly, feeling contempt and anger and disgust, but a desire to know the truth about the one person who might have truly cared about him made him nod his head to let his grandmother reveal her story.

After a moment of hesitation, of subdued relief, she continued her story.

"Before your father went off to the front, to try and repel the enemy from advancing, he found a small farm, far away from where the fighting was going on, where he felt we would be safe. It was a secluded place, at the end of a small road that didn't lead anywhere.

"For two years we were able to survive, relying on the meagre resources we had, and we heard that the war was coming to an end. One day, though, we heard the sound that we had always been dreading – the sound of strangers. It was a small group of soldiers, not ours. They had been retreating from the front, and by accident had come upon our isolated farm. They were about five minutes from our house when we heard their voices, and we had to act quickly.

"Your mother wanted to protect you. She knew all three of us could not just run away because you were only two years old, and we would not be able to get very far. The only question was who should go with you and hide in the nearby woods. She decided quickly that she would be the best one to deal with the intruders, and there was no time to argue. I immediately took you in my arms and fled to the nearby grove.

"The soldiers were surprised when they found it was just your mother living there. They knew from what they saw in the house that other people had to be living there, and they wanted to know where those people were. There had to be a good reason, they felt, why she would be hiding the existence of other people."

Daniel sensed where this story was now going, and he wasn't sure if he wanted, or needed, to hear the details of what happened next to his mother. But there must have been a reason why a simpler version of the truth could not have been told to him when he was little, instead of a complete lie about his mother's death. Somewhat reluctantly he asked his grandmother if she was alright with continuing her story.

"Perhaps it was because she was a woman all alone, or perhaps it was because we were a different ethnic group than the enemy, but the soldiers immediately started taunting your mother. First it was with words, and then it was with violence. Sadistic violence. I heard them demanding her to reveal the whereabouts of the others that must have been living with her. I heard them scream at her, and slam her head against the wall, and torture her. But your mother would not reveal a word about where we were.

"I placed my hands tightly around your ears so that you would not hear what was happening. I feared that at any second you might cry out, and that your mother's desperate attempt to keep you hidden would have been wasted... and dangerous.

I moved my hands from your ears to your mouth, and I held on so tightly, squeezing any sound that might have started coming out. The more your mother could be heard screaming and whimpering from the torture that was being applied, the tighter I covered your mouth.

"Just before your mother died I made a small prayer. Tears were welling in my eyes, and one tear had slowly started to slide down my face, about to reach my lips. How strange the human mind can sometimes be. In the midst of this horror, the teardrop that was reaching my lips distracted my concentration on what was unfolding. It briefly reminded me of an old tale that had been passed along in our family for several generations. To comfort us, when we were just little children, and crying, we were told that if we made a wish right after the first teardrop touched our lips, that those words would come true.

"I clasped my hands even tighter around your mouth to prevent you from revealing our hidden location. When I heard your mother – my daughter – crying from what was being inflicted upon her, a large tear from my eye had just touched the top of my lips. 'Please, God,' I whispered, 'don't let this child cry. Please let him live.'

"Daniel, whether you believe in a God, or not, my prayer – my wish – was granted. You survived the war. But you never did cry. Not once since that horrific day have I ever seen or heard you cry. My wish had become a curse upon you. I raised you by myself, always feeling guilty that it should have been me that stayed behind at the farmhouse that day, and not your mother. A mother should be with her child. I have never been able to forgive myself for your mother's death, and I am so sorry that my guilt affected how I raised you. I have loved you so much. I wish I could have shown you the affection I was always feeling."

Daniel wasn't sure what he wanted to say. The mix of hate and empathy he was experiencing was a burden he just couldn't deal with right now. He had to leave. He had to get out of that hospital room and get some fresh air. He stared at his grandmother for a few seconds, and simply said, "It was hard for you to tell me the truth, but I am thankful you could do it."

As soon as Daniel was outside, the cold winter air hurt as it rubbed against his face and his dry eyes. A teardrop formed and started to run down his cheek. When it hit the top of his lip he whispered, "Please God. Let me cry." ■

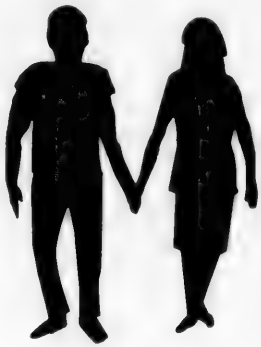
SUZANNE REISLER LITWIN



How am I supposed to have faith in you?
When there is so much evil in the world.
Is there a balance or in balance?
I'm waiting for the good to overtake the bad.
But, it's not happening.
Not yet
Not now
When?

Do you hear me?
Are you listening to the pain and suffering?
Do you see and feel the broken hearts and bones?
I'm told that I am 10 years away from non-believing.
I don't want this to happen.
Not yet
Not now
When?

I'm hanging on to your words.
I really want to believe the lessons and psalms.
But, I'm wallowing in my reliance, my sadness
I need some light, some life, some hope
You're on the way?
Not yet
Not now
When?

Oh, Gaaawd!
Lift me onto your back.
Carry me from the depths of this despair.
Deliver me from the ruins of this life.
Take me into your arms and armour.
I avowal you as my truth.
I do... I do...

Solly the Baker

MARVIN ZYLBER

My father Solomon Zylber was the original "Solly the Baker,"
He was a great deal breaker,
Loved by all, from the youngsters to the infamous Jewish movers and shakers

He was known as king of the hill,
Selling his food which took a great skill,
Sometimes working long hours - that was the drill,
Driving his truck throughout the Laurentian insuring everyone's appetite was fulfilled

From the country cottages they all came,
Some wearing their bathing suits, housecoats and anything else you can name,
Standing in back of his truck waiting in line only to proclaim,
"Solly I'm so hungry, what can I eat now, is it fresh, what's good to eat and none of the same"

He would drive everywhere in the Laurentians – from Trout Lake, Ste Agathe, Ivry to Ste-Adele,
Working so hard regardless if he was sick or if he was well,
But he knew he had to make a living in order to sell,
Lox, knishes, salamis, stuffed chicken, hot dogs, herrings and the rest of those delicious dells

Rumour has it that even the late Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau was crazy about his knish,
Others hosted grandiose parties serving his gefilte fish,
Kids remembered him for his free doughnuts, bagels and other foods satisfying their every wish,
His hope was that he supplied you with everything you wanted to eat from dish to dish

Few knew he came from Govorrow - Poland, a witness to the Shoah,
The Nazis killed many of the Jews there, burnt down its synagogue and desecrated its Torah,
But he came to Canada, married my mother Selma and had 3 children – kina hora
Helped whoever he could, once saved a child's life and performed other wonderful plethoras

I helped him out in the summer months when I was a young kid,
Carrying up the hills those heavy orders to places where those great big houses often hid,
Hoping along the way the pickle jar would not pop off from its lid,
Often getting licked by the family dog or cat – yes that is what I did

Solly the Baker – sadly his bread jobber business is no more,
But it was a nice summer job with my dad – and sure beats having to have worked in a store.

Goodbye

ERIKA RAKOWSKY, AGE 11

When the sun is high, in the sky,
I know it will be time to say goodbye.

And when you come back, if you do,
Just know, I will be waiting for you.

But right now the moon is saying Hi,
So there is no time for a teary goodbye.

Where ever you are going, where ever you end up,
Just know I am here, wishing you good luck.

I won't cry when you leave, not a tear on my cheek,
But when you are gone, the tears are set free.

I am glad you are going, finally set free,
But I'm sad though, you are leaving without me.

Magnify

ARIEL GOLDIE GOTTHEIL, AGE 4

Everyone up and down
And down and up.

Flashes and ashes.

A Passover story

HERB COHEN

Pesach is a happy time,
When families get together.
We gather round the table,
To celebrate the seder.

Grandma makes your favourite dish,
And grandpa tells the story,
How all our people came to see,
This land of hope and glory.

We drink a toast of bright red wine,
We taste a piece of matzah.
Each one of us must take a turn,
To read from the Haggadah.

The youngest asks four questions,
How all this came to be.
He says the ma nishtana,
Please answer them for me.

Then hide the afikomen,
And the children have to look.
To find the hidden treasure,
Like it says here in the book.

And now the seder's over,
As we all join in to sing,
We're thankful for the happiness,
That Passover can bring.

Friday night special

JAIME KASTNER

Julianna pushed at her sleeves, trying desperately to make a sweater into a tank top. She could feel red burning through her cheeks. After six days of receiving visitors, it was clear that Bubby didn't know how to adjust the air conditioner. So for this Shabbat, the first Shabbat, sweltering heat was going to have to do.

Julianna moved to the head of the table as her two brothers and two cousins threw kippahs at each other, arguing over who should wear the pink one. Bubby fussed trying to make the candles stand straight but residue from candles-past abated her success. Standing in her place, Julianna dodged inconspicuously, trying in vain to avoid getting an elbow in the rib as Bubby got more frustrated with her failure to make the Shabbat table look just right. Fearing that frenetic disposition was contagious, Julianna longed to join the boys at the other end of the table, to be part of their game of pitch-and-catch-the-kippah. She watched the two fathers stifle giggles as they faked stern expressions under the guise of needing to respect tradition. Trying desperately to detach from the moment, Julianna tuned in to the sound of clanging pots and pans in the kitchen as the mothers added spice and sauce to Bubby's "homemade" cooking. They ignored the torn wrapping from Solly's Deli sticking out from the garbage can.

"OK." Bubby exhaled as she pulled Julianna by the elbow. "OK," she said again, as if the word could somehow become reality if said enough times. The mothers scurried to their seats on either side of the head of the table, book-marking their exasperated mother. Julianna shared centre stage as Bubby began to mumble, waving her hands over the now-lit candles. The narrow space didn't allow for Julianna to reach above the flames so she mirrored the actions on the side. As the third wave was completed, she had just enough time to see one brother motion the other towards a blue cellphone glow streaming from under the white tablecloth before she covered her eyes.

The prayer wasn't long – 14 Hebrew words that theoretically had the power to raise the lighting of the candles to religious tradition instead of house-warming ritual. As Bubby mumbled, Julianna let her mind race through memories of holidays, birthdays, power-outages when the whole family sat by candlelight to complete a 1,000-piece Ninja Turtles puzzle.... With every word, a new candle-memory glowed in her mind as if old flames could be reignited from the ones that now burned. Then, in an instant, an off-key chorus of "Amen" broke through her reverie. The memories blew out and Julianna was released to the other end of the table.

Daniel made his way to Julianna's abandoned spot. He maneuvered his 5'10" frame awkwardly between the seats in the small dining area that was never intended to seat 10. As he neared Bubby, he had to jostle the 11th chair, which now sat by the wall but was careful to return it to its place just outside the dining table's perimeter... close but not quite there.

Daniel reached for the bottle of wine, carefully pouring into the gaudy silver cup sitting before him. A series of crude sculpted out characters were supposed to depict the exodus from Egypt. Eliyahu's seder glass symbolized the sharing of tradition with those not present but who were always welcome. Not entirely convinced that Bubby's mistake was an error, Daniel didn't have the heart to switch to a regular cup.

As the red liquid rose to the rim, he could feel his mother and aunt communicate silently on either side of him. Thoughts literally passed over Bubby's head as she haphazardly flipped through the siddur looking for the Kaddish. She fruitlessly searched in the Shacharit section. She was not the one who was supposed to be in charge of Kaddish. It didn't matter though. Her search was unnecessary. Daniel had committed the passage to memory years ago through the osmosis of Jewish schooling. He could recite the words without thought. And for tonight, that would have to be the case. He wasn't ready for active thought. He gently stole the book from Bubby, allowing her a chance to wipe tears that had slipped out as he flipped to the right section of the siddur. Eight glasses raised in tandem with his as Daniel began the prayer. Only Bubby's glass sat idly on the table as he recited the short paragraphs expressing gratitude for Friday nights and for wine. No one at the table had to be religious to agree with the message.

Daniel chanted the last words and raised the strangely heavy glass to his lips. Out of the corner of his eye, he could see his mother nudge a glass towards Bubby and mouth "sip". He took a swig, careful that all dribbles landed on the white tablecloth instead of his white shirt. Daniel then placed the silver cup beside Bubby's, right where his mother had left it.

Kevin gulped down a full glass of wine as he pushed his phone just far enough out of his pocket to see that the cute girl he had met the day before virtually, laughed out loud at his sardonic description of the pomp and circumstance surrounding the first Shabbat dinner without their grandfather. He wasn't sure why everyone had made such a big deal about getting together that night. Looking around the table, everyone seemed the same as always. They were only making a big deal because they thought they should.

As Bubby motioned for the night to continue, Kevin grabbed the knife in front of him. By design, the kippah balanced precariously on the back of his head. He got surreptitious reassurance knowing it was there. Kevin let the tip of the knife pierce through the crust as he began to spit out words he had been reciting since he was five years old. He rolled the "r"s in the back of his throat, imitating the distant memory of Hebrew teachers. He spoke effortlessly in the foreign language as he dwindled the loaf into 10 uniform pieces.

Bubby sat quietly, watching her mishpachah. The cousins began the ritual of "take-one-and-pass-it-down". Kevin declined to partake in the ritualistic snack, eyes still glancing towards his phone. Julianna sipped her wine well past the third chorus of "Amens". Daniel awkwardly reversed his path to get back to his seat. The mothers delved further into their idiosyncratic Morse code, communicating in an intricate dance of eyebrows and lip purses. As she watched Shabbat unfold before her, Bubby could feel her husband's steel-blue eyes stare at her from the picture hanging on the wall. Those eyes told her to eat, told her to laugh, told her to smile. But she did not want to eat or laugh or smile. It wasn't right. Nothing was right.

Suddenly she couldn't take it. Her mind raced with a million reasons why she couldn't be there, sitting alone at the head of the table. She imagined her daughters' inevitable arguments about her having to eat with everyone but she didn't care. She just couldn't stay there any longer. Bubby stood up. Entranced in her conviction to prepare her rebuttals, she hardly noticed when hot gravy started rolling down her back. Slowly the crash of plates on the floating floors of her apartment began to echo in her distracted ears. Bubby blinked, allowing her eyes to focus on Julianna and the mothers crawling under the table in an attempt to scoop the now floor-tenderized chicken back into the pot. The boys, young and old, watched from their seats as they teased the clumsy women for the careless traffic. Bubby scratched at a bubbly wet spot on the back of her neck, bringing forward chunks of gravy between her fingers. The slimy feeling made her instinctively shake out her hands, spraying brown gravy over the preserved image of Zaidy's pristine mustache.

She fell back in her chair and laughed. As the girls got rid of the evidence and the boys poured more wine, Bubby laughed. Then she ate a slice of bread. ■

Happy Passover From Uber Toronto

Uber

As Jewish families gather together for the Passover holiday, we at Uber would like to tell more about our company that can possibly assist families like yours.

Uber and ridesharing has become a part of everyday life in our city and is being used by people in over 400 cities worldwide, including in over 40 municipalities across Canada. In Toronto, it is changing the way we move around our cities by providing safe, reliable, affordable rides from downtown Toronto to Thornhill Woods.

Our mission is to make transportation as reliable as running water, for everyone, everywhere. That's why we recently launched uberASSIST, a door-to-door service that helps those with disabilities enter and exit the vehicle, and get around town. In fact, you can use it if you're stuck out and about, but your aging parent needs an extra hand getting to an appointment.

Ridesharing is beginning to address the issue of congestion, which is an issue here in the GTA. Uber is doing this with uberPOOL, allowing people to share rides with their fellow residents heading in the same direction at a great discount.

Ridesharing is also leveraging technology to improve safety, too. For example, every trip has live live GPS monitoring, and you can share your ride in real time with your loved ones, meaning you're never alone and. And, because of its reliability, Uber's entry into a community has been shown to reduce DUI rates by offering people a smarter alternative to getting behind the wheel while impaired.

Last, but certainly not least, Uber offers flexible economic opportunities for those that choose to be a ridesharing driver partner, even if for only a few hours a week. This includes: the retiree that is worried about make ends meet on a fixed income and needs a flexible job a few days a week, the single mom who needs to juggle raising her kids with putting food on the table, or the mensch who's simply saving up for an engagement ring for his beloved.

We are proud to be part of a country with such a strong and devoted Jewish communities. We want to wish you all a Pesach filled with happiness. Chag Samayach!

Ex-cook pretends to be a rabbi, and is marijuana kosher for Pesach?

The rabbi who was actually Catholic

A man who claimed to be a rabbi from Israel and served a Polish Jewish community for several years, but turned out to be a Catholic ex-cook, has disappeared. "Jacoob Ben Nistell," a.k.a., Yaakav, claimed he was from Haifa and served the Jews of Poznan, but admitted earlier this month he's not a rabbi. A reporter found out that his name is actually Jacek Niszczota and he's from north-central Poland. The head of Poznan's Jewish community says he never questioned the identity of Niszczota, who sported a beard and payot and said he learned Jewish and Hebrew prayer by listening to Israeli radio. The community started asking questions after seeing Niszczota on TV in ecumenical services with Catholic and Muslim clergy.

Actresses die on same day

Ronit Elkabetz, a three-time winner of Israel's version of the Oscars, died April 18 of cancer at 51. Elkabetz won Ophir Awards for her acting in Sh'Chur, Late Marriage and The Band's Visit. Israeli Culture and Sports Minister Miri Regev called her death "a huge loss for the film world and for Israeli culture." Since 2012, she'd served as head of Achoti, a Mizrachi feminist group. Meanwhile, also on April 18, Doris Roberts, the actress of Russian-Jewish descent who won four Emmys as the meddling mother Marie Barone on the hit CBS sitcom Everybody Loves Raymond, died in her sleep at age 90.

High holidays?

A leading haredi rabbi in Israel has ruled that marijuana is kosher for Passover and users can eat or smoke it on the holiday, the Times of Israel reported April 19. Rabbi Chaim Kanievsky of Bnei Brak explained that the plant, which is normally considered kitniyot, or a form of legume not permitted on Passover, is halachically OK when used for medical purposes. When presented with several leaves of the plant, the rabbi, a leading halachic authority, was convinced right away – he said the leaves had a "healing smell" and blessed them. He was responding to a request for a halachic ruling from the pro-marijuana group Sian. Another Israeli rabbi, Efraim Zalmanovich, ruled medical marijuana kosher in 2013. ■

Support Jewish radio

The article "Radio Shalom goes off the air," (April 14) quotes Stanley Asher who said, "If [New York], a city with a Jewish population of three million, can't support Jewish radio, it's hard to imagine Montreal could."

The Haitian population of Montreal is approximately 86,000. The Haitians have a 24-hour radio station supported by their community. We have a population of about 89,000. Where is our support?

Chaim Tzvi Tanny

In defence of B'Tselem

The serious question that should be raised is the slander against groups like B'Tselem ("Hebron shooting raises serious questions," April 7).

B'Tselem is an organization with huge regard among those for whom human rights provide a nation's moral legitimacy.

While the occupation continues like a Leviathan that keeps dispossessing, growing and crushing the rights of the occupied, does one expect Palestinians to fall to their knees in acquiescence?

Being an occupation army is a dirty business. This does not absolve the occupier from the application of the values that are inherent in both democracy and Judaism. B'Tselem is part of the conscience which may provide Israel with a moral legitimacy that many of its current political and military activities lack.

There is absolutely no case for stating "that while the motivation and reporting of B'Tselem may be questionable" unless one wishes to further diminish Israel's claim to adherence to laws of morality and justice.

The stellar commitment of groups like B'Tselem, the New Israel Fund and Breaking the Silence are the slender threads through which many claim to be Zionists. In the absence of civil and human rights, can a nation be clothed with the cloak of legitimacy?

Brian Rothberg
Perth, Ont.

The courage of Rabbi Cardozo

As a former student of Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo, who took a weekly class with him for a year and who was a guest at his Shabbat table, I can assure you that he is certainly not timid, neither intellectually nor religiously ("A timid hero," April 7).

He may have his differences with the Orthodox establishment, but that does not conflict with his identity as a proud and devout Orthodox Jew. He is strong enough to stand tall without the need to bend to others with whom he has theological disagreements. And he is respected by, and an influence on, many people.

Therefore what you term timidity is in fact, the very opposite. It is the determination to stand by what he believes in. He doesn't need the approval, or fellowship, of the Reform or Conservative establishment.

Debate can be too wide

Thanks Mira Sucharov for hosting the debate between Peter Larson and myself. While I believe that dialogue is better than the alternative, I want to make sure that everyone understands that I don't endorse the central point of your article, "It's time to widen the debate on Israel and Palestine," (March 24).

For me, the advocates of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement (BDS) must be confronted, as they seem to be gaining traction in the broader non-Jewish community, but I am not persuaded that the Jewish community itself will benefit from such discussions.

The Jewish community needs hasbarah education to ensure that we know how to refute the kind of arguments that are being put out by so-called anti-Zionists. It doesn't need to host debates in which these ideas are treated as respectable.

Comparison of Israeli governance to apartheid is libellous and fundamentally hateful. People who claim Israel is an apartheid state are violating a fundamental tenet of community. They are working actively to harm their fellow Jews, namely the people of Israel and the captured territories. I personally believe that we should hold that line firmly and support the current restrictions on who can appear at events sponsored by federations and by Hillel.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Thinking about the Messiah

Was the re-establishment of a Jewish state spiritually audacious, or was it a profoundly religious act by secular visionaries who saw an opportunity and took it?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: There is an interesting chassidic custom of celebrating the final meal of Pesach as a Seudat Mashiach, a meal dedicated to contemplating and actively working to bring the Messiah. Despite my rationalist, non-chassidic tendencies, I always try and organize one with some friends if I cannot attend a larger gathering. I find that, in the waning hours of a holiday that is rooted in history, focusing on the future helps to actualize all I have been thinking about over the past eight days.

In traditional thought, there are many different opinions as to who the Messiah is and what the messianic era will usher in. These predictions tend to be very specific and speak of someone arriving on a white donkey to bring about world peace and global acknowledgement of the Jewish God. By contrast, Maimonides, the paragon of rationalist thought, speaks of a more generalized era of peace and coexistence. This approach tends to resonate with me.

How do you approach the idea of the Messiah? And do you think that we are in the process of fulfilling the promise of "Leshanah haba'a b'Yerushalayim" ("next year in Jerusalem") by promoting the Zionist idea, or is that phrase really just about the final redemption?

Rabbi Scheim: The legendary Israeli comedy trio HaGashash HaHiver imagined an encounter between the newly arrived Mashiach and the chief rabbis of Israel. The rabbis, terrified at the negative impact on their fundraising and political achievements, beg the Messiah to leave, suggesting that he return in 100 years, attempting to convince him that "the end of days" has not yet arrived.

The Gashashim touched upon your profound question. Do we really want, in a literal sense, a rebuilt Temple in Jerusalem, with animal sacrifice and the like, or do we view the structure of Jewish prayer, modelled on the ancient sacrificial timetable, as a step forward in our people's spiritual development?

As for "next year in Jerusalem," it may have end-of-days implications, but I believe that these words serve a dual purpose: they affirm our connection with the continuum of Jewish yearning for a better tomorrow, while also recognizing the spiritual audacity of our pre-empting the Mashiach's arrival in our re-establishment of a Jewish state.

Rabbi Finegold: I do not think it is audacious or pre-emptive. I think that a better tomorrow begins with a better today.

The Seudat Mashiach occurs at the very end of the holiday, in the liminal space between Pesach and a regular day. Most people choose to just wait out the holiday for another hour and then go out and buy a dozen cheese bagels. But the chassid sees the liminal space as one final opportunity to do a mitzvah and change their internal state, to become closer to God. This kind of practice does not just usher in the redemption, it is the redemption itself.

If Passover is just a time to remember and wait for the future, then the potential has been squandered. That is why the establishment of a Jewish state is not audacious. It was the work of those visionaries who saw the opportunity for what it was and established the future in our time. Nevertheless, I still follow your lead and say "Next year in Jerusalem," to remind all those listening that there is still work to do.

Rabbi Scheim: I suspect that there are few in the chassidic or haredi world who would accept your (or my) theological understanding of the establishment of the State of Israel. Yet, it is remarkable that those who made aliyah to pre-state Israel, who were largely secular, would become the inheritors and transmitters of a deeply religious vision of a return to Zion.

Avraham Shlonsky, the renowned Hebrew poet who travelled far from his chassidic roots after he made aliyah, worked in construction and road-paving. In his poem Amal (Toil), Shlonsky described Israel as a tallit, its newly constructed houses as the batim, the boxes of tfillin, and the roads that he paved as retzuot, the tfillin straps.

The Zionist transformation, even when enacted by secular Jews, was a profoundly religious act. Like the Seudat Mashiach that you describe, it joined "next year" and this year into an unbreakable bond. ■

Getting the facts wrong about anti-Semitism in Canada

In an essay for the Huffington Post last week, writer/activist Yves Engler had the temerity to suggest that "anti-Semitism may be the most abused term in Canada today."

Engler opens by attempting to explain away pro-Hamas demonstrations at l'Université du Québec à Montréal and anti-Semitism at Concordia University, as well as York University's mural controversy and its student government's divestment campaign. This is, by the way, the same Yves Engler who was dismissed from his role as vice-president of the Concordia student union for his part in the infamous 2002 riot that forced the cancellation of a speech by Benjamin Netanyahu. In what could be a nod to his university days, Engler contends that the term anti-Semitism "is now primarily invoked to uphold Jewish/white privilege."

Then he really goes off the rails.

"Despite widespread discussion of 'anti-Semitism,' there is little discussion of Canadian Jewry's actual place in Canadian society," he continues. "Among elite business, political and professional circles Jewish representation far surpasses their slim 1.3 per cent of the Canadian population. Studies demonstrate that Canadian Jews are more likely than the general population to hold a bachelor's degree, earn above $75,000, or be part of the billionaire class." Is the implication that anti-Semitism must not be a problem since Canadian Jews are rich? If so, he might be interested to learn that poverty is on the rise in the Canadian Jewish community (see page 13).

Engler also notes "while Canadian Jews faced discriminatory property, university and immigration restrictions into the 1950s, even the history of structural anti-Jewish prejudice should be put into proper context. Blacks, Japanese and other people of colour (not to mention indigenous peoples) have been subjected to far worse structural racism and abuse."

There's more. "Prejudice against Arabs and Muslims appears rampant in the Jewish community," he claims, though he cites no statistical evidence to back it up, and the many contributions of the Jewish community toward Syrian refugees contradict his argument. Engler also disapproves of Jewish day schools and Jewish-majority neighbourhoods – "cloistering children by ethnicity/religion," he calls it. (He even takes The CJN to task for calling Jews the "Chosen People.")

"Inward looking and affluent," he adds, "the Jewish community is quick to claim victimhood," before ending with an ominous warning: "Without an intervention of some sort, the Jewish community risks having future dictionaries defining 'anti-Semitism' as 'a movement for justice and equality.'"

Inconveniently for Engler, the facts belie his position. Last month, Toronto Police released a report on hate crimes in the city during 2015, and for the 10th year in a row, Jews topped the list of most targeted communities. Meanwhile, in Montreal, there has been a spate of swastika and neo-Nazi graffiti recently. And in Vancouver, a man was found guilty of promoting Jew-hatred online less than six months ago.

Perhaps Engler might have come to a different conclusion had he accurately researched the Jewish community before publishing his essay. At this point, it's probably too late for that, but it would behoove Engler to take a close look at something else – himself, in a mirror. The facts suggest he has seriously misjudged the state of anti-Semitism in Canada today. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

Let's remember Israel's refugees from Sudan and Eritrea

Maya Fennig

This year, I am celebrating my first Passover in Canada, far away from my family and friends in Israel. While observing the holiday away from home will not be easy, it allows me to reflect on the story of Passover and its meaning.

Pesach is, after all, the movement of the Israelites from Galut, exile, to freedom in the land of Israel. This reality transforms the story of Passover from a simple and miraculous tale of the Jewish People's delivery from slavery to a contemporary and universal lesson.

Eight months ago, I was accepted to the prestigious Jeanne Sauvé fellowship and decided it was an opportunity I just couldn't pass up. I left the beaches of sunny Tel Aviv and moved to a house in Montreal, where I currently live and work with 11 other activists from around the world. Every morning, I prepare my French homework with my Bosnian roommate, debate current affairs with a political consultant from Romania, attend public speaking workshops with a communications expert from Yellowknife, and finish the day with a heated debate on interculturalism in Montreal accompanied by a spicy curry dish made by a grassroots Nepali activist. The days are never dull, to say the least.

We have been collaborating on a team project devoted to the timely issue of refugee integration within Montreal. My eyes have been opened to the generosity and goodwill of the Canadian people, particularly the Jewish community. I have learned about several synagogues and their members who have been organizing to help sponsor and support Syrian refugees, and that prominent institutions, such as the Jewish Holocaust Museum, are raising awareness of their plight. The community's genuine concern for people that they have little in common with, apart from a shared humanity, has been truly inspiring.

However, while the Syrian crisis has captured Canadian public attention, voices speaking out about other refugee situations are muffled. As a social worker and activist working with refugees in Israel for over nine years, I was shocked that only a handful of people I've met have heard about African refugees currently residing in Israel. My friend Adam lost his family when his village in Sudan was burned down by Arab Janjweed militias. In Eritrea, my friend Tesfay was subjected to brutal torture after refusing to comply with the totalitarian regime's policy of lifelong military draft. Both fled to Israel in search of a safe haven, only to find themselves in a country that doesn't want them. These are just two of many, many similar stories.

In Israel, 50,000 refugees from Sudan and Eritrea are currently stuck in a legal limbo – granted protection from deportation but denied the most basic human rights. They can't access health care, social services, or formal work permits, let alone any opportunity to participate meaningfully in Israeli society. And these are the lucky ones.

Thousands of others are detained at a detention centre located in the desert. This is one of the most controversial parts of Israel's management of African asylum seekers. The plan appears to be to make their lives so unbearable, so unimaginably miserable, that they will "voluntarily" return to Africa.

The situation of refugees in Israel is intolerable. "How can I decide between dying slow psychological death in a desert prison or to return home and risk torture and death? I'm not a criminal," my refugee friends ask me. I look into their eyes and I am speechless.

Israel, my country, was born out of the ashes of the Holocaust, built by refugees and immigrants searching for a safe haven. It is now failing to protect the people who seek shelter within its borders. Israel was one of the first signatories to the United Nations convention on refugees, which provided international protections to European refugees following World War II. Israel, therefore, is both legally and morally bound to protect refugees.

As I prepare to celebrate Passover with my international group of friends, I am determined not to forget my Jewish heritage as well as the refugees who are close to my heart. After all, the Exodus narrative is not just about the suffering and flight of the Jews – it delivers a universal message about the Jewish commitment to human rights and refugee protection. Indeed, the Torah restates no less than 36 times versions of the commandment to love the stranger as ourselves, for we know the heart of a stranger, as we were once strangers in the land of Egypt.

So this year, as we celebrate Passover with our family and friends, I urge us all to think of our neighbours from Eritrea and Sudan who have survived the perilous journey through the Sinai Desert only to cross the border to Israel and find themselves in a detention centre on the other side. ■

After Mulcair, what's next for the NDP?

As the New Democrats leap leftward, questions linger about what that might mean when it comes to supporting Israel

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Thomas Mulcair may have been ignominiously rejected as leader of the federal New Democratic Party, but he's being fondly remembered in the Jewish community for his support for Israel and ensuring that the party remained a welcoming place for Jews.

Mulcair, who will remain party leader until a replacement is named, lost a confidence vote at the party's recent convention in Edmonton. Party members were angry that his tack to the centre of the Canadian political spectrum led to the party getting walloped at the polls, and many withdrew their support.

Meanwhile, the left wing of the party stole the spotlight in Edmonton, introducing the Leap Manifesto, aimed at moving the country away from the use of fossil fuels.

Prominent proponents of Leap include the husband-and-wife team of Avi Lewis and Naomi Klein, both vocal critics of Israel, with Klein, a best-selling author, advocating boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) and labelling Israel an apartheid state. Lewis, whose father, Stephen, served as Ontario NDP leader and whose late grandfather, David, was once the party's national leader, has been touted by some as a potential leadership candidate to succeed Mulcair.

Whether the New Democrats go down the road laid out by Klein and Lewis remains to be seen. But last week, observers lauded Mulcair as an important figure in Canadian political history.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the community's primary advocacy organization, recalled Mulcair as "a consistent and unconditional friend to the Jewish community in Canada and their concerns on the advocacy agenda.

"He has maintained and even strengthened the process through which Jack Layton sought to bring the NDP into the consensus on the Middle East and Israel," Fogel said. He was "determined to show that the NDP was a welcome place for the Jewish and pro-Israel community."

Mulcair also lent his support to issues such as Holocaust remembrance and countering terrorism, and he maintained "a full and meaningful relationship" with Jewish community advocates, he added.

Tom Mulcair

> [Mulcair] was determined to show that the NDP was a welcome place for the Jewish and pro-Israel community
> Shimon Fogel, CEO of CIJA

In June 2010, Mulcair refused to agree with critics of Israel's blockade of Gaza or agree with claims of some in the NDP that Israel is an apartheid state.

Around the same time, Mulcair slammed NDP MP Libby Davies for her position on BDS: "To say that you're personally in favour of boycott, divestment and sanctions for the only democracy in the Middle East is, as far as I'm concerned, grossly unacceptable."

However, during the Feb. 22 parliamentary debate on a Conservative motion to reject BDS, Mulcair and the rest of the NDP, citing free speech concerns, voted against it.

Myer Siemiatycki, a professor in the department of politics and public administration at Ryerson University, believes "history is going to be kind to Mr. Mulcair."

Mulcair continued Layton's success in Quebec, demonstrating "it wasn't just a flash in the pan. He helped establish the NDP as a going concern in Quebec."

Of notable impact for Jews was that Mulcair "added to the pantheon of significant political figures who have made a breakthrough for the Jewish community in Canada," Siemiatycki said.

He is the first leader of the Opposition who has Jewish children, Siemiatycki noted, referring to Mulcair's Jewish wife, Catherine Pinhas, and their family.

His family never became an issue in the campaign. "That tells you something about the integration of Jews in the Canadian political system," said Siemiatycki, who holds the Jack Layton Chair at Ryerson, which was established in 2012 in honour of the late NDP leader's contribution to public service.

University of Toronto professor Nelson Wiseman also noted that Mulcair is married to a Jew and pointed out that the party's position on Israel did not vary much from the one adopted under Layton and previous leaders going back to Audrey McLaughlin.

As for concerns that with Mulcair's departure and the high profile assumed by proponents of the Leap Manifesto that the party might swing to a position critical of Israel, Wiseman disagreed. The party continues to support a two-state solution. However, he added, there's been a shift in public opinion in Canada over the years. "There isn't the same resolute support of Israel in the broader public as in the 1960s and 1970s," he said.

Young people in particular now increasingly see Israel as a powerful domineering state, he said.

Nevertheless, Wiseman said, the Middle East did not come up at the recent Edmonton conference and isn't mentioned at all in the Leap Manifesto.

As for suggestions the party might turn to Lewis as a potential leader, Wiseman again disagreed. He pointed to a recent Mainstreet Research poll for Postmedia in which 598 party members named Alberta Premier Rachel Notley, who has defended the oil industry and dismissed the Leap Manifesto "in the most derogatory terms," as having the highest favourability ratings among prominent party figures.

Eleven per cent of the New Democrats polled said they would support Lewis as party leader, even though he has said he has no interest in the job.

Wiseman said he doesn't believe discussions about Leap will amount to anything and that Lewis is not a viable leadership candidate. "Do you think Avi Lewis and Naomi Klein are going to win in Quebec?" he asked.

Grandparents should help out with day school tuition

Jeffrey Stutz

As a grandparent, I feel I have a stake in the success of Toronto's Jewish day schools.

Grandparents have been helping their children pay day school tuition for years. What has changed is that the burden of tuition fees for middle income families has escalated dramatically in the last 10 years. To find out whether grandparents are doing more now, I spoke to a few, as well as to fundraising staff at Toronto day schools.

While some grandparents give their children money for tuition, others pay directly to the school. Alice (not her real name) pays 90 per cent of the tuition for three grandchildren who attend Jewish day schools in Toronto. Her children have not applied for tuition subsidies, because they think they would not qualify. Despite that, Alice says that they would find it "a considerable hardship" to pay current tuition fees on top of the high cost of housing and child care. "The parents are the generation that can least afford it, so we have to share the burden," Alice says.

Donna, a grandparent of modest means, told me why she contributes toward her grandchildren's tuition. "If I had one grandchild, I could do more," she said. "But I have five, and only three of them go to day schools. I can only give to one what I give to all." Still, she explains, "It's important to give what you can afford, even a symbolic amount. You're sending a message to your grandchildren that Jewish education is important."

How many grandparents contribute to day school tuition? Elysa Greisman, director of advancement at Associated Hebrew Schools, says it's a "sticky question," because Associated only knows about grandparents who pay tuition to the school. It doesn't track money that flows from grandparents to parents. Nevertheless, Greisman estimates that 20 to 25 per cent of students benefit from the support of grandparents.

> It communicates to children and grandchildren that you value Jewish education

Rhona Birenbaum, chief financial officer of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Toronto's Jewish community high school, says that only a small proportion of students – less than five per cent – have tuition paid directly to the school by grandparents. TanenbaumCHAT issues charitable receipts to all parties who pay a portion of tuition. According to Birenbaum, there could be two, three or even four parties paying the tuition of a student.

Over the last three years, TanenbaumCHAT has been reaching out to grandparents. The school hosts an annual Grandparents Day, when grandparents attend a class with their grandchildren. Associated has a program to involve grandparents in the school, too.

Of course, grandparents helping pay for day school tuition is not a new phenomenon, nor will it solve the affordability problem. Even so, we should remember that our tradition regards Jewish education as the responsibility of the whole community. After all, Jews were the founders of free public education, going back 2,000 years.

As Alice says, "I'm able to look after my family, but that doesn't guarantee that the schools and the community in Toronto will continue to be strong. I'd really like to see the leadership of the community put down the money to ensure that future generations will have access to day school education."

In my view, grandparents should contribute what they can afford to day school tuition. At the end of the day, paying something toward day school tuition is more than a financial matter. It communicates to children and grandchildren that you value Jewish education. ■

Get out of town! (It might be all you can afford)

Daniel Held

I used to be told that 80 per cent of the Toronto Jewish community lived within five kilometres of Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue. Growing up, I was an outlier – I lived 11 kilometres away.

For decades, the community grew up the Bathurst corridor, with Jewish neighbourhoods moving farther and farther north. The 2001 census pointed to the astounding growth of the Thornhill Jewish community. By 2011, the locus of growth had shifted further north to Thornhill Woods, which grew by 614 per cent in the intervening decade.

Like much of North America's move to the suburbs, Jewish Toronto's northward migration has been driven in large part by real estate: newer houses on larger lots at lower prices. Over the last decade in particular, Toronto's housing market has exploded, with the cost of housing nearly doubling during this period. With household incomes virtually stagnant and a constant increase in the cost of living – especially the cost of Jewish living – the Toronto real estate market has made it more and more difficult to make ends meet.

Over the last few weeks, two initiatives caught my eye. The first was FrumCity, which aims to develop a new Jewish community in Innisfil, Ont. FrumCity's mission is "to offer a sustainable, affordable, growing frum lifestyle within a short commute to the GTA by facilitating Jewish community infrastructure" The organizers' plan is to develop momentum for a sizeable group of families to build a new, religious community together in Innisfil, 45 minutes north of Toronto, where housing is significantly less expensive.

The second was an open house hosted in Toronto by Think Hamilton, an initiative to grow the Jewish community in Hamilton. With a day school, synagogue, kosher food and less expensive housing, Hamilton, according to the group's website, is "built and ready."

Both initiatives urging people to leave Bathurst Street are innovative and address a pressing issue. Both, however, are mainly targeting Orthodox Jews, leaving behind too many in our community who struggle with similar challenges.

The non-Orthodox community is also starting to leave Bathurst Street. The 2011 National Household Survey demonstrates that the rate of Jewish population growth in Ontario cities such as Barrie, Belleville, Guelph, Oshawa and Peterborough is far greater than the Toronto Jewish community. Unlike FrumCity and Think Hamilton, however, the growth in these areas is more often the result of happenstance than a planned Jewish community affordability and engagement strategy. The result of these moves, I fear, is also borne out in the demographics that indicate the intermarriage rate is far higher in these outlying communities than in the Bathurst corridor.

If we, as a community, are going to make headway on the issue of the affordability of Jewish life, we must factor in not only the cost of schools, camps, and synagogues, but also tackle the cost of housing in Jewish neighbourhoods.

FrumCity and Think Hamilton are two examples of creative thinking to solve the housing challenge. In many ways, the establishment of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, which predated much of the housing development south of it in Thornhill Woods, was a similarly bold move to provide Jewish services in an emerging community.

To ensure the vibrancy of Jewish neighbourhoods – which is a key ingredient in Jewish continuity – other such initiatives are necessary. Ideas have been bandied about: seeding new communities along commuter train lines; collaborating with developers to create affordable housing – particularly for families – in Jewish neighbourhoods; or leveraging existing community land to develop appropriate housing stock. It's time for these and other ideas to take root and forge solutions.

For decades, our community has been strengthened by the Jewish character of the Bathurst corridor. Without interventions – for both the Orthodox and non-Orthodox communities – the Jewish community will become geographically dispersed and lose the reinforcing impact of Jewish neighbourhoods. ■

'Don't make me come down there'

Jean M. Gerber

Remember when you were on the way to the store on a hot day with no air conditioning in the car and three squabbling urchins in the back seat? Having reached the end of all that good advice from parenting books?

"Don't make me stop this car and come back there!"

Or "Would you like me to stop this car and have you walk to [hockey practice, Billy's house, Amy's party]?

That is the sense I get about the recent flap over Vancouver's invitation to Achinoam Nini (Noa) to appear at this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut gala. It's kid stuff.

First off: not every Yom Ha'atzmaut act in the past has rung the bell for me. Once we left the event after our eardrums had been assaulted by the latest Israeli band, whose name I mercifully forget. Obviously, they were a big hit with some, but I found their performance execrable.

But never mind. It was Israel Independence Day – for about 2,000 years, it was a day we thought would never come. That was the miracle, not the badass band.

Now we have a situation of a different kind. The left-leaning Noa has been called out as, well, an enemy of the people. At least our people. Falsely accused of support for the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, she was vilified not only in the press but also on social media – surely the latest twisted use of that otherwise important tool of modern communication, since neither press account nor social media frenzy was true.

While some leaped on the anti-Noa bandwagon, others came to her rescue. She went on singing and holding views about the dysfunction and flaws of the current Israeli government and various parties of that country. This can surely be no news to anyone inside or outside of Israel: that is, that there is a deep, deep divide in Israel over many issues of national identity and policy.

And why not? Surely the sign of a democracy is the extent to which alternate political views are tolerated.

As if to pile on irony after irony, no sooner had the Jewish National Fund pulled out its support for the Vancouver event than the Israeli Embassy and the Consulate of Israel (Toronto) affirmed their support for the celebration.

Hmmmm.

In this paper, Natan Sharansky, chair of the Jewish Agency, is quoted as writing: "In these turbulent days, when enemies on the outside strive to delegitimize Israel, there must be a place within for a broad range of views…" And he "often had the pleasure of enjoying Noa's outstanding voice and spectacular talent."

Playwright Tony Kushner, too, has raised organizational ire, given his extreme left-wing associations. Of course, I can't agree with everything he says about Israel and his association with an organization that supports the BDS movement.

But!

Kushner will talk about his art, not his politics. Noa is not going to speak, but to sing. Can't we just enjoy her talent and leave the gritting of teeth at home? Can't we acknowledge the vital issues – racism, AIDS – that Kushner raises with his art? Is this a sandbox or a community?

So, as my favourite professor (a.k.a. my husband) says, "What can we learn from this?"

We can learn that our little internal arguments are, after cold reflection, a bit silly. Why do children in a sandbox end up throwing sand at each other? When parted by anxious and apologetic parents, kids usually admit to having no idea how the fight started.

There is a wonderful magnet on our refrigerator. It says: "Don't make me come down there." And it's signed, God.

Well, hopefully this time, She or He will not have to intervene. Don't you think the Creator of our universe has better things to do than watch esteemed Jewish organizations snark at each other? I do. ■

Israelis cannot 'end the occupation' on their own

Paul Michaels

For many people earnestly committed, in the case of Israel, to the noble cause of social justice, there is today perhaps no greater misconception than believing that it's up to Israelis to "end the occupation."

Heard repeatedly, and often with heightened emotion, this call betrays a lack of historical awareness about steps Israel has taken in the not-too-distant past to try to achieve peace with the Palestinians, only to have those efforts rejected. It also betrays a profound naiveté about what is required in the first place to reach that goal.

It's essential to understand that "ending occupation" is not something Israel alone can do, nor is it required by what many advocates of Palestinian statehood claim, with reference to the United Nations, is stipulated in "international law." (Israel's 2005 unilateral withdrawal from Gaza does not change this fact.)

To appreciate why this is so, it's necessary to return to basics, which, unfortunately, have been largely forgotten. Following Israel's 1967 war of self-defence, the UN Security Council, in November of that year, passed Resolution 242 outlining a road map for a "just and lasting peace in the Middle East." At its core are two essential principles: Israel was called upon to withdraw its armed forces "from territories occupied in the recent conflict," but that withdrawal (the extent of which was undefined) was not to be unilateral but was premised on Arab states extending to Israel recognition of its "right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force."

Moreover, 242 was clear that peace meant the "termination of all claims" – in short, the end of conflict.

Resolution 242 provides significant safeguards for Israel. As Abba Eban, Israel's brilliant and dovish former foreign minister and diplomat (who favoured a two-state solution before this idea gained traction), wrote in the early 1990s in a New York Times op-ed, 242 amounted to "legitimizing Israel's presence in the territories pending a peace agreement."

This resolution has been the bedrock of all Arab-Israeli (and, since the inception of the Oslo agreement in 1993, Palestinian-Israeli) peace-making. It's the basis upon which, in the 1979 peace agreement with Egypt, Israel withdrew from the Sinai Peninsula. The same goes for territorial and other adjustments made between Jordan and Israel in their 1994 peace agreement.

During the Oslo process between Israel and the PLO, 242 was the basis for Israel's territorial withdrawal from parts of the West Bank. Further planned withdrawals were stymied when then-PLO chairman Yasser Arafat failed to live up to his part of the agreement to provide peace and security to Israel. Tragically, Arafat never made the transition from "revolutionary" leader to statesman and, following his rejection of the 2000 Camp David process, pursued violence and terrorism instead.

While the Oslo process didn't explicitly call for a two-state solution, that was the direction things were taking. This was the case with the Camp David and Taba talks in 2000 and 2001 and, eight years later, with the Annapolis talks involving Arafat's successor, Mahmoud Abbas, who also rejected a chance for Palestinian statehood. In both instances, the rejection was caused, not by the complicated but resolvable issue of Israeli settlements, but by the persistent Palestinian refusal (since the 1947 UN partition plan for Palestine calling for the creation of "Jewish" and "Arab" states) to recognize Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People.

In addition, the Palestinian insistence on the (non-existent) "right of return" to Israel of what are now millions of Palestinian refugees, thereby turning it into another Arab-majority state, means the letter and spirit of 242 – the termination of all claims for the sake of genuine peace – are violated.

Unless the Palestinians compromise along with the Israelis to bring about an "end the occupation," peaceful reconciliation will inevitably remain an unfulfilled vision. ■

Jewish critics find flaws in assisted dying bill

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Dan Moskovitz

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

The federal government's recent introduction of Bill C-14, designed to permit physician-assisted suicide, prompted widely divergent responses among Canadians, ranging from criticism that it did not go far enough to suggestions it put Canada on the path to government-encouraged dying.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the community's major advocacy organization, found that elements of the bill addressed concerns it had raised over the proposals of a parliamentary committee that studied the issue.

"We are pleased that C-14 conforms with other North American jurisdictions where MAID [medical assistance in dying] is legal, restricting access to adults who are approaching a natural death," said Noah Shack, CIJA's director of policy. "In more permissive European jurisdictions, children and individuals with psychiatric disorders or minor medical conditions can be eligible for a hastened death. We are glad that the government has chosen a more moderate approach.

"We look forward to exploring the possibility of an additional provision to explicitly ensure that physicians who do not wish to provide MAID for reasons of conscience cannot be compelled to do so," Shack said.

As to critics' suggestions that the bill did not go far enough – that it ignored the parliamentary committee's recommendation to permit mature minors, people suffering mental illness and those not suffering a terminal illness to choose to die – Shack said: "We empathize with patients under the age of 18 who are suffering and may wish to avail themselves of MAID. However, there are significant concerns both with minors taking such a grave decision on their own and with parents taking such a decision on behalf of their child. In our view, given the finality of MAID, a cautious approach to criteria for consent is warranted."

Bill C-14, which passed first reading on April 14, was formulated in response to a Supreme Court of Canada decision about one year ago in the Carter case that struck down Criminal Code provisions against assisted suicide. The High Court gave the federal government until June 6 to craft legislation that permitted physician-assisted death.

With a bill on the horizon, CIJA canvassed the Jewish community and found "divergent opinions on whether physician-assisted death (PAD) should be permitted in Canada."

Some in the Jewish community were concerned about where the country is headed.

Janice Halpern, a Toronto psychiatrist, said the proposed legislation "appears to have protected a range of vulnerable patients, which is something we have fought for. At the same time, however, it does not sufficiently protect the conscience rights of health care professionals.

"Should this bill be passed, Canada will have the dubious distinction of being the only country with assisted dying legislation that forces health-care professionals to act against their values, morals or religious beliefs," she stated.

"One very recent and surprising twist is that members of our Senate are considering holding up the passing of this bill in order to make it more extensive – to endanger the vulnerable," Halpern noted.

Rabbi Dan Moskovitz of Temple Sholom in Vancouver has counselled a patient undergoing chemotherapy who was in great pain and wanted to die. On other occasions, family members have sought his advice about patients in the late stages of a terminal illness.

"I advised that we cannot hasten death, but we must do all we can to alleviate pain," he said.

Rabbi Moskovitz, who has written an extensive sermon on the topic, said Jewish law prohibits assisted death, and he would advise against it.

However, he acknowledged his advice is not binding, and ultimately it's the individual's choice.

"I do support the bill," he stated in an email correspondence. "I think people in general should have that option. But as a Jew, it is not one we are empowered to make. There are things the larger society can do that Jews as per our covenant with God cannot.

"I worry about an obligation to die. The societal and socio-economic implications are significant," he stated.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai in Toronto, said, "I was reassured that the government bill struck a more responsible tone than the recommendations of the [parliamentary] committee. I was pleased that suggestions from the committee regarding minors and mental illnesses were not included in the government bill. I am hopeful the bill continues in that direction."

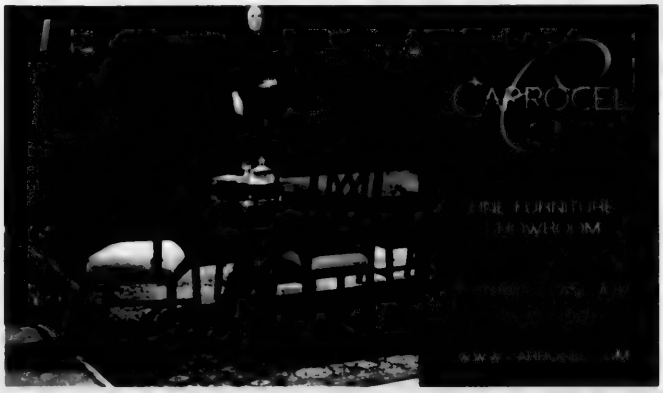
He said PAD should apply only to people diagnosed with an illness that can't be cured and whose suffering cannot be ameliorated. That would apply to only one to two per cent of "late life" cases, he said.

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, who co-authored a document with Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation against physician-assisted dying, said the Canadian public and health care professionals have "to do what we can within the law to turn it back and scale it back as much as possible."

Although he conceded the bill would likely pass, Rabbi Korobkin said opponents should do all they can to limit its applicability.

He said Jewish law has always believed that life comes from God, and "suicide is tantamount to murder. The Lord gives and the Lord takes away. They're not our lives to take."

Rabbi Korobkin, senior rabbi at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, said the document he and Rabbi Strauchler crafted has received wide support among Orthodox rabbis and from spiritual leaders in other streams of Judaism. Now, "we must reach out to other faiths, to create a broader coalition of louder voices to be heard by politicians and health care facilities," he said. ■



Long-term solutions to poverty complex, agencies say

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The results of a year-long study commissioned to understand the challenges facing Toronto's Jewish poor could leave service providers with "more questions than answers," said Sandi Pelly, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's director of capacity building for the social services.

Following the release of the Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA's 2011 National Household Survey, which highlighted that Canadian Jewish poverty rates are on the rise, a group of Jewish service providers commissioned York University sociologist Randal Schnoor and a team of researchers to conduct a study to better understand how to serve Torontonians in need.

The survey found that more than 24,000 Jews in the GTA, or 13 per cent of the Jewish population, are living under the poverty line.

"There was an increase of more than 5,000 people over a 10-year period," Pelly said. "The numbers are going up, not down. We have over 5,000 seniors and over 3,500 kids under 15 that are poor, and there was also a big increase in the number of poor – because of the increase in the population – in York Region."

Schnoor and his team spent a year on what he called "one of the biggest studies I've ever conducted," with 15 one-on-one interviews, 33 people in six separate focus groups, and 403 phone or online surveys.

He said some of the respondents were at or below the poverty line ($20,386 a year, after tax), while others were slightly above it.

"What we learned is that poverty cuts across the lifespan. It impacts our youngest and oldest community members and it doesn't matter where they live geographically," Pelly said.

The report highlighted "the vicious cycle of living in poverty and what that means for people… 32 per cent of people in the study are skipping a meal, 54 per cent are borrowing money to pay for their daily needs, 74 per cent of kids don't have new clothes, and 58 per cent don't have new shoes or boots that fit them."

Both Pelly and Schnoor cited the common misconception that people in poverty are uneducated. "The study respondents revealed that education is not a determining factor of poverty. Nearly half have university undergraduate or graduate degrees and 38 per cent that had a university degree are looking for work," Pelly said.

Schnoor said there are circumstances beyond people's control that can determine whether they fall below the poverty line. "Certain life circumstances, which can really happen to anyone… can take your life in a different direction. It can be a physical disability, which came out really strong as a cause for poverty. It could be a mental health problem, which also came out strong, a dysfunctional family… these people can be highly educated and highly intelligent, but these kinds of life circumstances threw them a big curve," he said.

What's unique to the Jewish community is the barrier faced by those who can't afford to take part in communal life because of the high cost of shul, day school and camp fees.

Schnoor said there's a level of isolation experienced by poverty-stricken citizens that goes beyond Jewish community participation. "All your buddies are going for lunch, or to a movie, or to a bar… but because it involves buying a drink, having lunch, it really limits your social life and it is very isolating," Schnoor said.

He added that many people aren't aware of the depth of the problem. "The Jewish community does not understand the extent of the challenge and has an inaccurate notion that all Jews are comfortable. So first thing is that it's important to raise awareness in the community," he said.

Pelly said a number of Toronto-based Jewish agencies convened by UJA Federation, including Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS), JIAS Toronto, JVS Toronto, Bernard Betel Centre and Kehilla Residential Programme, are part of the Collective Impact Steering Committee that is working to break the cycle of poverty.

The group aims to do more than come up "with a program or two… Even though we know this is an urgent problem, the methodology doesn't imply that we can do something quickly. It really is a long-term, game-changing, three- to five-year minimum to start to see a needle change," Pelly said.

"We're starting with an initiative to provide impoverished seniors and Holocaust survivors with care and support so their basic needs are met and they can live their final years in dignity… We need to do something now and we don't have time to waste." ■

Chabad on Bayview breaks ground for new shul

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

With temperatures soaring, more than 150 people came out April 17 to break ground and lay the cornerstone for Chabad's $9.5-million Bayview Centre for Jewish Life.

"Today is the beginning of something amazing," Rabbi Levi Gansburg, spiritual leader of Chabad on Bayview, told the crowd. "Historically, in Jewish tradition, the ritual has been called hanachat even hapinah, which means laying of the cornerstone... Although the ceremonial groundbreaking is a western-world institution, the laying of the cornerstone dates back to the times of the Temple and prior to that as well. Today is another link carrying forward the unbreakable chain of our ancestors' traditions in the 21st century.

"We chose today because Jewish identity is always heightened around Pesach and it is the week adjacent to the late Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneersohn's, of blessed memory, birthday, which is a special time, particularly for Chabad. This building is an extension of him and our work under his auspices. We are motivated by the Rebbe, his legacy and his ideals, and thought this would be a great way to bring the community together in time for Pesach and in time for his birthday week," said Rabbi Gansburg.

The new building, to be located on Bayview Avenue north of Post Road, will house a mikvah, nursery, Hebrew schools and be available for life-cycle events. The sanctuary will have approximately 220 seats and a back wall will open into a social hall that will double the space to accommodate some 500 people on larger events and holidays.

"We are very proud that we will have the very first mikvah on Bayview – a state-of-the-art mikvah – which is something that has always been at the heart of the Jewish home," Rabbi Gansburg said.

Chabad has raised $5.5 million for the project, which is slated to open for Rosh Hashanah 2017. "We are about $3.5 million shy of where we need to be. Through the generosity of so many amazing people, this went from being a dream to slowly evolving into this reality, which we are excited about," said Rabbi Gansburg.

Among the rabbis, rebbetzins, family and friends at the event were politicians such as MPs Rob Oliphant and Michael Levitt, and Toronto City Councillor James Pasternak.

More than eight years ago, Rabbi Gansburg and his wife Rivky erected a sign half a block away, announcing the opening of Chabad on Bayview for the 2007 High Holidays.

"We moved to Toronto from New York City with our daughter, who was just 10 days old. We started with 20 people on the High Holidays, and through word of mouth – one family told another family – we grew. It took us a year and a half to get a minyan, but we persevered and pushed forward," said Rabbi Gansburg. "Today, there are over 300 families coming through and making use of our schools, our shul and our varied programs every year."

Over the years, Chabad has moved to several locations along Bayview with a dream of one day having a permanent home.

"The initial seed was planted by a young rabbi and rebbetzin who saw the potential of this community. Since then, there have been a ton of worker bees behind the scenes in their respective areas of expertise [bringing] Rabbi Levi and Rivky's dream to fruition. The work is not done yet. We are just beginning," said Reid Stekel, a member of the building committee.

"This building is only a means to an end," said Rabbi Gansburg. "The goal is a stronger and more vibrant Jewish community where every person feels welcome and has a place to call home – a home which fosters robust dialogue, celebrations and a growing and strengthening Jewish identity."

He added: "The future of the Jewish People is bright. We are proof that people care about the future. People care that they have a place to belong." ■

Analyst sets out agenda for tackling Mideast crises

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The "man on the Clapham omnibus" visited Beth Tikvah Synagogue last week and quickly approved a tactical suggestion from guest speaker Gregg Roman that the West must pick a side in various Mideastern conflicts and lend it full support.

Geoffrey Clarfield, who took on the role of the fictional "average man" on the Clapham omnibus, pointed out there were potential allies throughout the turbulent Arab world. In Egypt, supporting Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, the country's president, against the Muslim Brotherhood's Mohamed Morsi, was a "no-brainer," he said.

Clarfield, executive director of Mozuud, an organization whose agenda includes freedom of speech and sanctions on Iran, was part of a panel of three who responded to the presentation by Roman, who serves as director and chief operations officer of the Middle East Forum.

Roman surveyed events across the region and presented a "Forecast for Freedom in the Middle East," which was far from rosy.

Earlier that day, terrorists had struck an Egged bus in Jerusalem, injuring 21. It was, he said, an event that should be considered part of the third intifadah, which began some months ago with knife attacks on Israeli civilians.

Gregg Roman

"We have now entered to a new stage of the conflict," moving from lone wolf attacks to more co-ordinated ones, as demonstrated in the bus bombing, he said.

Roman also referred to the news that Israeli security forces had uncovered a terror tunnel that ran from Khan Yunis in Gaza into Israel.

The question is not "if" there will be another Hamas-initiated attack, but when, he said.

Broadening the scope of his discussion, Roman, who served as political adviser to Israel's deputy foreign minister, examined conflicts throughout the region and noted that major wars in the past – whether the U.S. Civil War or World War II – ended only when one side utterly defeated the other. The war in Syria will continue until one side is defeated, he suggested.

At present, "Syria is a mess," he said.

Looking at the wider Middle East, Roman said, "ISIS is ideologically stronger than ever" though its military is on the run, Russia is backing the Assad regime in Syria, Iran is acting as a regional hegemon, and the Obama administration is afraid of picking a side or of committing troops to the region to defeat ISIS.

The United States, Roman said, sided with the Muslim Brotherhood-linked Morsi against its traditional ally in Egypt, and it has ignored Arab and Israeli concerns over a nuclear deal with Iran.

"U.S. credibility is a penny stock right now," he said.

At the same time, ISIS has staged attacks in the heart of Europe, prompting a nationalist backlash that is now playing out.

Until western nations are willing to force the absorption of new immigrants, there will be further problems, Roman predicted.

Despite a rather pessimistic appraisal of the region, Roman said not all hope is lost. Western states can adopt a strategy to make things better, starting with support for minority populations facing oppression and genocide at the hands of ISIS, such as the Yazidis, Turkmen and Kurds, and help them carve out semi-autonomous governments in the region.

The West should use "proxies" such as local paramilitary groups in the fight against ISIS, even though these groups might not share western values, he said.

The West should adopt realistic objectives and use force to attain them. He suggested adapting the "Earl Butz rule," named after a former U.S. cabinet minister, to stress that if you don't have military power at play, you have no place at the negotiation table.

Roman's address was sponsored by the Speakers Action Group. Joining Clarfield on the panel were Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah, and Iranian-Canadian columnist Sara Akrami. Miles Smit served as the event moderator. ■

Camp George celebrates 18th birthday with fundraiser

jshupac@thecjn.ca

At Camp George, a Jewish overnight camp located near Parry Sound, the infirmary – known as the health and wellness centre or by its Hebrew name the mirpa'ah – is much more than a place to treat cuts and bruises, explains camp director Jeff Rose.

"It's a place where campers can go to find support. They're doling out a lot of TLC there as much as they are any medicine," he said.

Camp George, Canada's only Reform Jewish overnight camp, is celebrating its 18th summer this year and is in the process of updating some of its facilities.

To mark its landmark birthday and to raise money to renovate the mirpa'ah, Camp George is hosting a dinner and dance event at Temple Sinai Congregation on April 30.

Dubbed Rockin' on the Chai Way, the event will feature music by Slice of Life, a 10-piece cover band in which Camp George's doctor for the past 16 years, David Saslove, plays and his daughter, Alex Saslove, sings.

There will also be musical performances by several Camp George counsellors and alumni, said Cheryl Ackerman, the event's committee chair, who is married to Saslove.

Slice of Life, a band featuring Camp George doctor David Saslove (in the hat) will play April 30 in support of a new health and wellness centre for the camp. DAVID SASLOVE PHOTO

"Our daughter [Alex] has been at camp since she was three. She's now 20. That's not atypical for Camp George, for parents and their kids to have been involved in the camp since its inception," she said.

Ackerman said the event is open not only to those directly affiliated with Camp George but to "anyone who loves to dance and who wants a good dinner and to have a fun evening."

To build the new health and wellness centre, which the camp hopes to do by 2017, the fundraising goal is about $400,000, Rose said. "We've been focused this whole year on "chai" and healthy living as we endeavour to build this centre... It'll be a place where campers can come to relax, get away and meet with a support team [of health professionals]," he said, noting the camp always has a rotating team of one doctor and two nurses on staff.

The 18th birthday is a real milestone for Camp George, Rose said, because the camp has long felt like the new kid in town among the range of more established Jewish summer camps in Ontario.

"We initially started with between 50 and 100 campers, and now we get close to 500 campers annually. So our camp has really become its own entity within a landscape of Jewish camps," Rose said, noting that Camp George's plan is to continue expanding its facilities.

Its identity as a Reform camp is reflected in its values and much of its activities, he said, listing, as examples, programs that teach campers about tikkun olam and "egalitarian Jewish values."

In addition to singing Jewish songs at mealtimes, reciting blessings after meals and having Israeli staff members who give campers insight into what it's like to live in Israel, Rose said the camp has a focus on what he called "social action programming."

"For example, every summer we devote one day when one of the units goes into the community to give back. They'll go to an old age home, to a home for the blind... They've done a car wash to raise money for a local fire department," he said. ■

Tickets for the April 30 event can be purchased at www.campgeorge.org.

Gathering hears premier discuss mission to Israel

Approximately 100 "thought leaders" gathered at the Munk School of Global Affairs on April 18 to be briefed about potential business opportunities in Israel, about one month before Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne leads a provincial delegation to the Jewish state.

Participants included business leaders, academics and representatives from the Jewish community. The event was highlighted by an address by Wynne and by Israeli consul general DJ Schneeweiss.

University of Toronto professor Janice Stein moderated a panel discussion, that looked at opportunities for business collaboration between the two jurisdictions.

Joining Stein on the panel were Geoff Smith, president and CEO of EllisDon, a construction services company that is incorporating technologies developed by Rafael Advanced Defence Systems in Ontario power management systems; Henri Rothschild, CEO of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, which fosters business relationships between the two sides; and Jocelyn Mackie, vice-president of operations and general counsel for Grand Challenges Canada, a government-supported agency that funds health-related innovations.

The breakfast event was sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), in co-operation with the Munk School and the Ontario Chamber of Commerce.

Israeli innovation, high-tech and the way the country fosters startups and scales them to become commercially viable entities was at the top of the morning agenda, said Sarah Lefton, CIJA's vice-president for the GTA.

"Thought leaders" heard how the values shared by Canada and Israel extend to the business world, opening the door for collaboration and partnerships in a variety of fields, she said.

Lefton pointed to an outcome beyond the practical business-to-business cooperation that may result from the premier's trip.

"This is about more and better enhanced relationship between the two, about more of a relationship, not less," she said.

"That is the best response we have as a community to fighting BDS [boycott, divestment, sanctions]," Lefton added.

Schneeweiss said "Israel's achievements in the field of innovation can be harnessed and learned from in ways that can serve Ontario.

"Israel has immense capacities and strengths and approaches to some of the issues common to us all, and Ontario can benefit by learning how Israel does things, and carry the innovations forward," he said.

Ontario has access to capital, a large market and its own know-how that Israel can benefit from, he continued.

"We see this very much as a two-way street. Together we can all be better," Schneeweiss said.

Just under a year ago, Wynne announced that she would visit Israel as head of a trade delegation. On April 6, she confirmed the visit would take place May 15 to 20 and that she would be accompanied by the leaders of 20 Canadian companies, with an emphasis on those in the high-tech, life sciences and information technology sectors.

"I look forward to strengthening our political, economic and cultural ties on my first mission to the Middle East," Wynne said April 6. "We share many of the same priorities – including an interest in developing a strong innovation economy that can produce the next generation of technological and life-science breakthroughs." ■

Azrieli Foundation funds Israeli stem cell breakthrough

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Israeli and American scientists, funded in part by Canada's Azrieli Foundation, have discovered a tool that could help develop cures for a wide variety of genetic disorders and help further other medical advancements.

Last year, the Azrieli Foundation allocated $10 million to fund research at the Azrieli Center for Stem Cells and Genetic Research at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, one of the largest repositories of stem cells carrying genetic diseases and chromosomal disorders in the world.

Foundation CEO Naomi Azrieli said she's very excited about the discovery.

"They created a new type of stem cell line, which, more than anything right now, is a tool. It is an important, different, and completely innovative set of tools where they'll be better able to do genetic screening and understand the development of genetic diseases and human development. The result of that is going to be... new therapies in cancer, new therapies in nerve regeneration [and] regenerative medicine, [as well as] diseases that relate to aging and diseases that relate to child development."

An Israeli research team led by the director of the research centre, Prof. Nissim Benvenisty, and Ido Sagi, a PhD student there, published their findings in the March edition of the medical journal Nature.

The research paper describes the stem cells as the first human cells that are known to be capable of cell division with just one copy of the parent cell's genome.

Most human cells are known as "diploid" cells because they inherit two sets of chromosomes – 23 from each parent. Egg and sperm cells are the only exceptions. They are known as "haploid" cells, because they contain a single set of 23 chromosomes.

The scientists succeeded in triggering the division of unfertilized human egg cells and isolating the haploid stem cells.

The researchers showed that these cells were able to differentiate into many other cell types, including nerve, heart and pancreatic cells, while retaining a single set of chromosomes.

In diploid cells, it is more difficult to detect the biological effects of a single-copy mutation, because there is another normal copy that serves as a backup. Having a single copy of the gene to target may be a powerful tool for genetic screens and offer the potential to facilitate genetic analysis in biomedical fields such as cancer research, precision and regenerative medicine.

"They've created the next, most cutting-edge tool in order to look at the way genes develop and what they do, and then actually be able to manipulate them. That is what is very exciting," Azrieli said.

"There are a number of other new technologies that have literally just happened this year, that make it possible, along with this now, to actually edit genes. This tool is like the last element scientists needed in order to do that really easily."

Azrieli said that one of the reasons the foundation chose to donate to the stem cell centre was because of the work it was doing on the developmental disorder Fragile X syndrome.

"It is the No. 1 cause of... of developmental delay in children worldwide. It's the number one genetic-based cause. They're interested in finding treatments, maybe even finding a way to repair the genetic disorder that underlies it," she said, adding she's confident the new discovery will achieve even more than that.

"This can be used to look at genetically based disorders of all kind. It's a very wide-ranging discovery. It is not specific to one disorder, to one disease... I think it will be used worldwide in labs, doing all sorts of research on all sorts of diseases... I expect this will be widely applied in about six months to a year." ■

Jewish candidates fall to blue wave in Manitoba

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Michael Lazar

In reality, none of them had a chance.

Four Jewish candidates ran in last week's Manitoba provincial election, but even if the Liberals and NDP had been more competitive, it likely wouldn't have made a difference.

On April 19, the Progressive Conservatives, led by Brian Pallister, won in 40 of the 57 province's ridings in an election that was about change more than anything else. The blue wave swept away the NDP government that had been in office for 17 years, leaving just 14 NDP MLAs.

And even though the Liberal vote actually increased by 50 per cent – to 14 per cent of the total – and the party picked up two additional seats – they have elected only their leader in the past four elections – it was of no benefit to Michael Lazar, the party's flag-bearer in Tuxedo.

Lazar, a local lawyer who is active in the Jewish community, had unsuccessfully run for provincial office twice before. This time, he had three strikes against him even before voting began.

First, he was running against a longtime incumbent in one of the wealthiest ridings in the province, and one of the three Winnipeg ridings with large Jewish populations. Tuxedo has been a PC stronghold for decades.

Then there was the collapse of the Liberal brand during the campaign. The party went into the election with a new leader, Rana Bokhari, and polling neck and neck with the unpopular NDP. Bokhari, however, came across poorly during the campaign, with a resulting decline in support.

Finally, Lazar joined the race relatively late. "I did as well as could be expected, considering that I was nominated rather late in the day and we were going against a Conservative tide," he said. "I had a small and dedicated group of people working for me, but we did lack resources and manpower."

On election night, Lazar finished third with 1,254 votes, 35 votes behind one of the other Jewish candidates, 23-year-old university student Zach Fleisher, who was representing the NDP in the riding.

Fleisher is the former chair of the Manitoba branch of the Canadian Federation of Students. He was most recently press secretary to the provincial NDP cabinet. He's still working toward a degree in political science at the University of Winnipeg.

Fleisher said his goal as a candidate was to protect the legacy of the NDP. He praised the former government's efforts in health care, education and job creation for young Manitobans like himself.

"I am afraid the PC cutbacks will derail the progress we have made since 1999," he said.

The other two Jewish candidates were running for fringe parties. Jitendradas Loves-Life (formerly known as Jordan Bellan) is a yoga teacher who ran for the Green Party in the inner city riding of Logan. He didn't do any campaigning, though.

"I was asked by friends to stand for the Green Party," he said. "I support everything the Green Party stands for."

The fourth Jewish candidate, Matthew Ostrove, ran for the new Manitoba Party, which was founded by disgruntled Liberals who were unhappy with Bokhari. She lost in Fort Rouge, the riding she chose to run in for her first election. Ostrove ran for the Liberals in the 2011 provincial election.

The campaign was free of any controversy where the Jewish community and Israel were concerned.

Speaking for the community, Jewish Federation of Winnipeg CEO Elaine Goldstein said it remains non-partisan.

The former NDP government enjoyed good relations with the community and Israel, and was involved in several joint programs with Israeli organizations and institutions, as was the PC government of Gary Filmon in the 1990s

Of note was the defeat of former NDP cabinet minister Christine Melnick who, although not Jewish, over the years proved to be a good friend of both the community and of Israel, which she has visited several times. ■

PASSOVER

Deeper than the Matzah-Ball Soup

Dr. Michael Laitman
Professor of Ontology

With the "Jewish Rite of Spring" we call Passover being just around the corner, there are plenty of things to take care of, and plenty of things to decide: Where will we have this year's Seder, the festive Passover meal? How will we go through the cleaning? What should we get for our in-laws? How will the kids endure the Seder, and other 'weighty' matters.

No Rest for the Righteous

Without a doubt, Passover takes the crown for "Most Stressful Jewish Festival," and the Seder is by far the most demanding culinary event on the Hebrew calendar. Our ancestors had a miracle: they were saved from the Egyptians. We, their contemporary descendants, have two miracles each year, if we are lucky. The first is that at the end of Passover we are still one family. The second is that we manage to lose the extra pounds we gained during the days of wine and matzo, but the latter is only for the truly, truly lucky ones, the "chosen people."

But there is more to Passover than matzah brei and gefilte fish. From the perspective of the wisdom Kabbalah, it represents a profound transformation that each of us experiences at some point in our spiritual development. So this year, let's look a little deeper than the matzah ball soup and point out some things about Passover that we usually tend to pass over. Let us take a look at some of our traditions and see what lies behind them.

Why Is This Night Different?

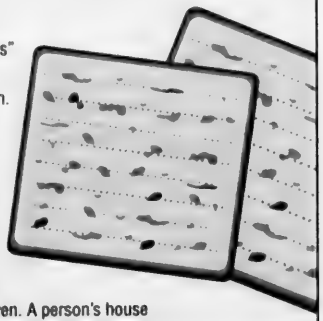
The Seder night, for instance, stands for more than a miraculous escape from a ruthless tyrant, though this is certainly a remarkable feat in its own right. Beyond that, the Seder [order] represents a sequence of internal steps we must take in order to exit from enslavement to the ego!

Freedom from the Ego

In one of his letters, Maimonides wrote, "We should know that Pharaoh is indeed the evil inclination." This inclination is our ill-will toward each other. Running from Pharaoh means escaping from this ill-will. Yam Suf [the Red Sea] represents the Sof [end] of our enslavement and beginning of our freedom from the ego. From here on we can begin to cultivate brotherhood and love of others until we unite "as one man with one heart" at the foot of Mt. Sinai.

The Passover Symbols

The special Passover dishes and traditions represent stages, or forces that help us on our exit from our egos toward love of others.



- We drink four cups of wine because wine represents wisdom, the force that develops us. Our ego develops in four phases, so we need four "doses" of wisdom to correct it.
- The Passover Seder plate contains various symbols of situations we must experience as we struggle with the ego, whose moniker is Pharaoh.
- The Afikoman is a matzah that is broken in half during the early stages of the Seder. One half is eaten and the other is put aside. This symbol represents the great force by which we run from Egypt. The second must be eaten before midnight—the darkest time of night—when a person feels that life in the ego, namely Egypt, has nothing to offer but darkness and gloom.
- This brings us to the matzah. Its name comes from two words, matzah and merivah, which roughly mean strife. The matzah represents the inner quarrel between Pharaoh, the ill-will, and the Creator, which is The Good Who Does Good, the benevolent power of giving. The matzah is also called "bread of poverty," since it represents a person's choice not to enjoy anything that has to do with the ego. We resume eating bread after Passover to show our triumph in the battle, that now we delight in giving rather than receiving.
- Speaking of struggles, we must not forget the Passover cleaning. In general, leaven symbolizes egoism. This is why the matzah dough cannot contain leaven, and why the matzah is also referred to as "unleavened bread." But there is more to cleaning than clearing out leaven. A person's house represents the sum of one's desires, one's entity. Cleaning it means searching for filth (egoism) and clearing it out. When we declare that the house is kosher for Passover, we are actually declaring that we have cleansed our souls from egoism and are fit to transition into brotherhood and love of others.

Rekindle the Unity

This year, as we sit together with our families around the Seder table, let us remember that Passover is about love and brotherhood. Especially in these days of growing social tensions, it is a good idea to remember the roots of our nation are unity, mutual responsibility, and love that covers all other feelings. Let us rekindle them among us and pass over to the next level—of freedom from Pharaoh and brotherhood and care.

Conservative shuls merge to create new congregation

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

Following last June's official vote to amalgamate and a number of months of gradual consolidation, Ottawa's two largest Conservative congregations will soon be known by the new name of Kehillat Beth Israel.

The name of the combined congregation was chosen to reflect and incorporate the past of both groups while also being "new" and representing the cohesive congregation that has emerged.

Congregation Agudath Israel and Congregation Beth Shalom will each have a part of its original name, joined by the word "Kehillat," meaning "community of." A committee tasked with naming the "new" synagogue canvassed all members by survey and received 420 responses, of which 77 per cent preferred Beth Israel.

Kehillat Beth Israel, located in the synagogue formerly known as Congregation Agudath Israel, is fully egalitarian and affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. The combined membership, allowing for some overlap in terms of people who may have been members of one congregation and associate members of the other, is expected to be approximately 800 families, which will make it one of North America's larger Conservative congregations.

Kehillat Beth Israel boasts a new, more accessible low-rise bimah.

The physical requirements, as well as the spiritual needs, of the congregation are also being addressed.

"As we got closer to amalgamation, the discussion shifted to addressing the needs of physically challenged and our older congregants who were having trouble navigating the bimah in order to have an aliyah," said Stuart McCarthy, co-president of Kehillat Beth Israel, along with Lorne Goldstein.

"By creating a low-rise bimah, more central to the congregation and turning the front several rows of seats inward to face the sides of the bimah, and adding a ramp, we accomplished all goals and inaugurated it during Jewish Disabilities Awareness Month in February," he added.

"This was done on a very tight budget, with a crew of about a half-dozen congregants volunteering their time, the services of a carpenter and the donation of some of the materials," he said. "We are very proud to have the first fully accessible bimah in Ottawa."

Clergy for the new congregation will also employ the concept of "yours, mine and ours."

Cantor Daniel Benlolo from Congregation Beth Shalom and Rabbi Deborah Zuker of Congregation Agudath Israel – whose position deals with outreach to young families – will soon be joined by Rabbi Eytan Kenter, who was recently chosen to become senior rabbi of the newly amalgamated congregation and who will arrive in Ottawa at the beginning of July along with his wife, Staci Zemlak-Kenter, and their young son, Boaz.

Rabbi Kenter, a graduate of Columbia University and the Jewish Theological Seminary and the Davidson School of Jewish Education, grew up in Westchester, N.Y., and has been associate rabbi and chief learning officer of Congregation B'nai Torah in Atlanta for the past seven years. ■

NDG Chabad wants to buy former church hall

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Rohr Chabad of NDG has launched a public fundraising campaign to buy the former church hall it occupies from the real estate developers that own it. Chabad says it must be in a position to make an acceptable offer by the end of May.

Director Rabbi Yisroel Bernath told The CJN April 19 that "ideally" he'd like to raise $1 million, but "realistically" he needs at least $800,000 for a down payment.

With that, and the $500,000 it has in hand, Rabbi Bernath believes Chabad is in a position to support a mortgage and maintain the building, which is about 100 years old.

However, by that date, Chabad was still in negotiations with the developers, led by Robert Blatt, over the price.

Chabad has been in the property on Hingston Avenue since September 2013 as a rent-free tenant. It finds itself "in limbo" since the Côte des Neiges-Notre Dame de Grâce borough council earlier this month withdrew its approval of the developers' planned housing project on the site, following strong opposition from nearby residents.

The developers have not made public their intentions, but Rabbi Bernath said he knows they've received offers for the property. Chabad has been given "the first right of refusal," which means that Chabad has first dibs, if it can match other offers, said Rabbi Bernath, underlining that he considers the developers "friends."

Chabad of NDG, founded by Rabbi Bernath in 2008, had previously been located in three different rented storefronts. It was looking for a permanent home when it entered into an agreement with the developers in 2013 that allowed it to occupy the hall with the understanding Chabad would buy it from the developers within 18 months, or by about March 2015. That did not happen.

The hall is adjacent to the former St. Columba Church, which was sold by the Anglican diocese to the developers in 2012 and has remained empty ever since.

In the April 18 announcement of the online campaign, Chabad appealed to "the local, national and international community" to help "a synagogue under attack from [a] local elected city councillor."

That refers to the tirade at the April 4 borough council meeting by Jeremy Searle, an opponent of the housing project. He charged that Chabad was resorting to "the overused Jewish guilt argument" and insinuations of anti-Semitism to deter the opposition.

In March, 224 residents signed a borough registry opposing the project, well above the minimum that, by law, would have forced a referendum, unless the council retreated.

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath

The developers' plan was to demolish the main church building and construct seven townhouses, while preserving the hall and allowing Chabad to remain there – although under what terms was not made known.

The project faced opposition for various reasons – the loss of a heritage site and the style of the proposed housing, among them – but neighbours have also complained about Chabad's presence from the outset, as well as about noise and other nuisances.

Chabad uses the hall for Shabbat services and holds classes and activities during the week. An unaffiliated daycare centre, there for more than 30 years, remains upstairs, and Chabad makes the premises available to community groups for a small fee.

Rabbi Bernath said if Chabad is unable to buy the hall, its options are limited. He assumes a new owner wouldn't let Chabad stay, whatever their plans for the property. He's looked at other places in NDG, but hasn't found a suitable place to buy or rent.

Chabad of NDG, which also serves Concordia University's Loyola campus, has seen a steady growth in participants, most of them not Lubavitchers, which is why it's moved so often. He said the centre needs at least 3,000 square feet for large gatherings, plus a kitchen and another smaller room. The hall, which is 3,800 square feet, is ideal and the location is good. He believes Chabad is meeting a need in the area, noting that, according to Federation CJA, there are more than 6,000 Jews living in NDG, and it has 1,400 addresses on its mailing list.

Rabbi Bernath, a Chicago native, deplores that a district known for "peaceful coexistence across cultural and religious lines" has been riven by what he sees as the hostility of some residents and inflammatory accusations by Searle. "For an elected official to accuse people of such a thing as [instilling] 'Jewish guilt' is just horrible to me," he said.

"Nobody from our community ever said a word about anti-Semitism in this debate. It was Mr. Searle who introduced this concept." He said many people were upset by Searle's remarks and his lack of apology or clarification, and he expects he'll be questioned at the May 2 borough meeting.■

Places named for alleged Nazi sympathizer to go: mayor

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Mayor Denis Coderre promised that public places in Montreal named for a French Nobel laureate, who was an alleged Nazi sympathizer, will be changed soon.

He was referring to a street and park in the Rivière des Prairies district, near the eastern tip of the island, honouring Alexis Carrel, a physician who won the Nobel Prize for medicine in 1912.

Coderre, in consultation with Rivière des Prairies-Pointe aux Trembles borough mayor Chantal Rouleau, announced the decision of his executive committee on April 20, a day after D'Arcy McGee MNA David Birnbaum called on all municipalities in Quebec to remove Carrel's name from public places.

Birnbaum has also contacted the mayors of Châteauguay and Boisbriand, where there are also streets named for Carrel, a pioneer in vascular surgery, who died in 1944.

Birnbaum says Carrel was "a proponent of eugenics and a supporter of the collaborationist Vichy regime in wartime France."

The MNA cited the German edition of his book L'Homme, cet Inconnu, in which Carrel praised the Nazi regime, writing: "The German government has taken energetic measures against the propagation of the defective, the mentally diseased, and the criminal. The ideal solution would be the suppression of each of these individuals as soon as he has proven himself to be dangerous."

In the same book, Carrel endorsed destroying humanity's "inferior stock" through the use of gas chambers.

At time of writing, Birnbaum had received no response from Mayor Nathalie Simon of Châteauguay or Mayor Marlene Cordato of Boisbriand to his demand.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) commended Coderre for his swift action.

CIJA termed Carrel "an enthusiastic supporter of the Nazi regime's sterilization of minorities, homosexuals, criminals and people with disabilities in order to create a so-called master race."

The organization called on Châteauguay and Boisbriand to follow the example of Montreal and Gatineau, which last year got rid of a street named for Carrel. That only happened following a two-year campaign led by a resident to get the city council to do so, and representations by CIJA.

"It seems to me that each of the mayors would want to move swiftly to remove this painful and public honouring of an individual who propagated views shared by Adolf Hitler and his Nazi regime," Birnbaum stated.

"Quebec was one of the first jurisdictions in the world to adopt a law commemorating the Holocaust each year. That day is approaching in May, and it would be a sign of respect to Holocaust survivors among us, as well as to all residents of the municipalities, to honour the opportunity remove this dishonoured name from their public face."

He pointed out that municipalities can quite easily vote to propose such name changes to the provincial Commission de toponymie du Québec for approval.

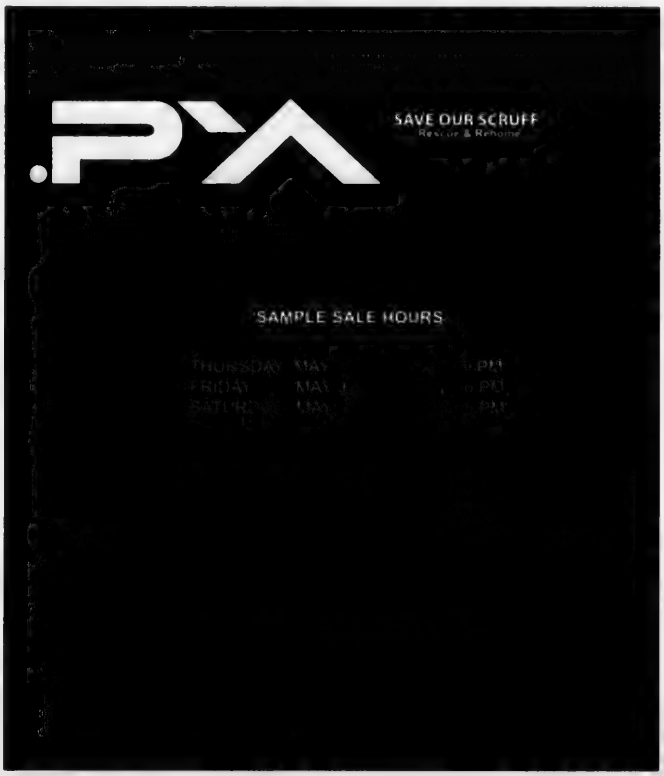
CIJA stated: "While it is clear that these municipalities did not knowingly pay tribute to a man whose views were so contemptuous of humanity, there is no place to honour a proponent of such inhumane ideas in an advanced democracy such as Quebec."

Gatineau also renamed a street last year honouring another Nobel laureate with clear Nazi sympathies, the German physicist Philipp Lenard (1862-1947), who was an active proponent of Nazism and supporter of Hitler.

Alexis Carrel became Albert Einstein Street and Philipp Lenard was renamed Marie Curie Street, after two other Nobel winners.

Quebec City also once had an Alex Carrel street, which became Maurice Bellemare Street.

The Nobel Prize organization makes no mention of Carrel's alleged association with Nazism. The online biography states that Carrel, a close friend of Charles Lindbergh, returned to France from the United States when World War II broke out and worked for the Ministry of Health. The following year he became director of the Carrel Foundation for the Study of Human Problems, set up by the Vichy government, until his death. Due to this support, Carrel was accused of collaboration. ■



'Many Jews on the left are strong supporters of Israel'

JSpaceCanada, a left-leaning Zionist pro-Israel organization that supports a two-state resolution to the Mideast conflict, disputed the contention that the left of the political spectrum is somehow synonymous with anti-Israel sentiment.

"There is nothing whatsoever about Israel in the Leap Manifesto. The signers of the manifesto include a lot of respected names, some of them not even particularly associated with the left, [such as] Roy McMurtry, Robert Bateman, Leonard Cohen.

"Many Jews on the left are strong supporters of Israel and Zionism. The fact that some are not does not equate with a worldview that only those to the right of the political spectrum support Israel and that those on the left can be presumed to be anti-Semitic, anti-Zionist and anti-Israel. To tar the entire NDP with the same pro-BDS brush wielded by some on the left is to do a disservice to those in the party that have spoken out strongly against the vilification of Israel and the delegitimization of the Jewish State," JSpace stated in an email.

"As far as we are aware, the issue of Tom Mulcair's strong and unwavering support of Israel was not even mentioned at the leadership review," JSpace added.

Meanwhile, in an email to its supporters earlier this month, the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center pointed out that delegates attending the NDP convention in Edmonton "quashed a motion to support the anti-Israel BDS campaign in closed-door committee session. Since the committee proceedings were private, no numbers on the vote were released, but there appears to have been little support for the motion, as it failed to reach the convention floor." ■

Despite tunnel fever, it's business as usual on Gaza border

Judah Ari Gross
JERUSALEM

Soldiers on the southern Gaza border have not changed their mission or their outlook following the discovery of a Hamas attack tunnel penetrating deep into Israeli territory from the coastal enclave, an officer said.

Despite a renewed public focus on the Gaza Strip in light of the tunnel – found earlier this month – the facts on the ground have not changed, nor have there been any marked changes in the day-to-day security routine along the separation fence.

Notably, still-classified tunnel detection technology – which some in the government have touted as the only answer to the threat of subterranean attacks – has not affected the operational methods of the infantry troops on the ground.

Gaza duty today is more or less the same as Gaza duty in 2014 and 2012 and 2010, according to the officer, who serves there today and has been stationed there numerous times throughout the years.

The new, mysterious technology has not necessarily shifted the overall balance along the border, some experts have said. And practically no one believes that the threat from Hamas in Gaza has been neutralized.

Though there have not been any radical escalations recently, it would be wrong to conclude that the region is calm. "On the Gaza border, you don't sleep so well at night," the officer said. "The next round is just a matter of time," said the officer, who asked not to be named for security reasons.

In the days preceding and immediately following the announcement of the tunnel's discovery, the army moved to reassure the public that it had everything under control, using attention-grabbing press briefings and speeches.

The prime minister, defence minister and other officials credited the discovery of the tunnel to a new, "unique" technology, trumpeting it as a dramatic shift in the power dynamic on the border. Last Wednesday, April 20, Likud MK Miki Zohar declared during a conference on the threat of the tunnels in Sderot that this new technology was "the only reason" the tunnel had been found.

In response, Col. (res.) Yossi Langotzky, who previously served as adviser to the IDF chief of staff on the threat of tunnels, called Zohar "an idiot."

"There is no physical barrier that cannot be overcome," Langotzky said during the conference.

"If you build a system that can detect a tunnel up to 40 metres deep, [Hamas] will build a tunnel below 40 metres," he told the Times of Israel.

For years, Langotzky has been warning the relevant bodies about the tunnel threat, but unheeded at every turn. To this day, he said, he remains persona non grata at the Defence Ministry.

The tall, imposing Langotzky said that without an independent, dedicated government body responsible for the tunnel threats emanating from both Hamas in Gaza and Hezbollah in Lebanon, Israel will remain at risk of attack.

Although the secret technology is said to have discovered an attack tunnel in Israel, Langotzky brushed it off as an ultimately ineffectual stopgap measure. "If I were a Gaza border resident, I wouldn't sleep well at night," he said at the conference, which was attended by Israelis who live in that area.

For its part, the army has downplayed the new technology, insisting the tunnel was located using a combination of means, including intelligence and "boots on the ground."

A few days before the tunnel was revealed to the public, a senior military official disclosed Israel's current security assessments of Hamas in Gaza. Yes, Hamas is rebuilding its arsenal, the official told reporters. But no, it's not yet prepared nor interested at this point in an imminent conflict.

However, the official stressed, Israel is prepared, with a thorough battle strategy and detailed intelligence. "We have a plan to overwhelm the military branch of Hamas," he said.

During the conference in Sderot, the head of the Southern Command, Maj.-Gen. Eyal Zamir, made some waves in the Hebrew media when he discussed the existence of plans to evacuate communities on the Gaza border in the event of a war.

To the officer on the border, those reports were something of a shock: not because he was unaware of those battle and evacuation plans – far from it – but because others were surprised that Israel does have them.

"You always have a plan that says what to do if there's a war here, what to do if there's a war there," he said.

Being prepared for anything is the hallmark of a good warrior, the officer said, looking in the direction of Gaza. "Even as we're speaking, I'm thinking to myself, 'What happens if someone comes from over there? What happens if a mortar falls?'"

For the past six months, soldiers from the infantry Golani Brigade have been stationed along the southern section of the Gaza border.

The soldiers, the "boots on the ground," are still actively searching for tunnels. "That's not even a secret; the other side comes and takes pictures," the officer said.

In addition, violent protests near the fence – which can include "800 to 1,000 people," occasional sniper fire on army troops and vehicles, and attempts by individuals to breach the fence and infiltrate Israel – are what occupy the troops on a regular basis.

The terror attacks and unrest emanating from the West Bank seem to have had a greater impact on the local population than the discovery of the tunnel this month, the officer said.

The Gaza border was once Israel's most volatile, but it has cooled since Operation Protective Edge in 2014. Last year was the calmest of the decade there, in terms of rocket fire and incidents along the fence.

Calm, however, can be deceiving, and the soldiers stationed there must be constantly prepared for any eventuality.

"Our motto is: Be like a coiled spring," the officer said. "And if we ever have to hit back, we'll hit back with force."

For soldiers, serving on the Gaza border is "entirely different" from serving in the West Bank, in terms of both tactics and psychology, he said.

"In the West Bank, everything is mixed together. Everything has a lot of meaning, even just one guy at a bus stop. Here, there's a fence," he said. On one side is Israel, on the other Gaza.

There is a certain "simplicity" to that dynamic, which makes it an easier place to serve, he said.

It does, however, come with its own challenges. The powder keg nature of Gaza places enormous responsibility on the shoulders of 18- and 19-year-old soldiers, who must handle incidents along the border with restraint and maturity – two things for which teenagers are not particularly renowned.

If the IDF responded with a heavy hand to every minor incident along the border, Israel would rapidly find itself in yet another conflict with Hamas in Gaza. But at the same time, attacks on Israeli sovereignty cannot simply be ignored.

It is a difficult balance to strike. There is a need for soldiers on the border who are ready to react when a demonstration turns violent, but not overreact and potentially spark a more significant incident. To mitigate that issue, "we have very clear rules of engagement," the officer said. ■

Far-right makes political gains in Austria

JTA
VIENNA

A politician from Austria's far-right party won 36 per cent of the votes in the first round of presidential elections, beating all rivals and clinching the movement's best electoral showing to date.

Norbert Hofer of the Freedom Party, or FPO, led by a 16-per cent margin over an independent, left-leaning candidate who he will face in the final vote on May 22 for the post, which is largely a ceremonial one.

Hofer's campaign focused on opposition to the arrival to Austria of migrants from Syria and Iraq, including many refugees. Hundreds of thousands of them have passed through Austria in recent months. In the second round, Hofer will run against the independent candidate Alexander van der Bellen, who is an environmentalist with a pro-refugee agenda.

Popular opposition to the arrival of refugees to Austria offers only a partial explanation to the FPO's successes, according to Karl Pfeifer, a veteran journalist and anti-fascist activist who formerly edited the official publication of Vienna's Jewish community of 8,000 people.

> I fear for what this victory means.
> Karl Pfeifer, Austrian Journalist

The Jewish Community of Vienna has shunned FPO, which it regards as having problematic ties to neo-Nazis. FPO chairman Heinz-Christian Strache has denied these allegations and recently visited Israel, where he met with Likud officials. In 2012, Strache apologized for posting on Facebook a caricature depicting an obese, hook-nosed banker wearing star-shaped cufflinks.

"The success of the FPO reflects the political centre's failure to provide an alternative," Pfeifer told JTA last Monday. "Instead of confronting the FPO, the political establishment either ignored it or shifted rightward to steal would-be FPO voters, but the voters went to the source and cut out the middleman," he said.

Another independent candidate, the right-of-centre former judge Irmgard Griss, clinched 19 per cent of the vote. She has not yet endorsed any of the remaining candidates in the final round. In France, mainstream rival parties put aside their differences and endorsed one another to keep the far-right National Front from winning. "But this sort of behaviour does not occur in Austria," Pfeifer said.

If Hofer wins, Pfeifer said, "it is my opinion that the Jewish community will have no choice but to co-operate with him, as it is bound to work with Austria's elected leadership. I fear for what this victory means...because it signals a slide into a restrictive democracy of the kind that exists in Hungary." ■

Netanyahu and Rivlin call for unity in annual Passover greeting

> I send my greetings to all the 'house of Israel'

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Reuven Rivlin came together on Friday to issue a joint Passover greeting to the Israeli people.

The two leaders met at the president's official residence in Jerusalem to discuss Netanyahu's visit to Russia this week, and recorded a joint holiday video message.

"This is an opportunity to wish all the Israeli people a joyous festival, a holiday during which all the people are united. May we stand united against the challenges we face and overcome them," Rivlin said.

Netanyahu, who spoke after the president, singled out Israel's security forces, praising them for tireless protection of the country.

"Mr. President, together with you I send my greetings to all the 'house of Israel', and in particular to the Israeli servicemen and women, our soldiers, policemen and women, those serving in the border guards, who watch over us all year round," Netanyahu said.

IDF Chief of Staff Gadi Eisenkot, meanwhile, was attending a seder for lone soldiers at a resort owned by the Association for the Wellbeing of Israel's Soldiers, Ynet reported. Almost 500 soldiers from 35 countries, who do not have family in Israel, were joining him.

Israel's soldiers will not go short of matzah over Passover, with the Defence Ministry sending some 95 tons of the unleavened bread to army bases across the country. The ministry also distributed 15,000 cases of the traditional dish of haroset and 27 tons of kosher for Passover pastries. ■

Jerusalem bus bombing was a suicide attack

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israel closed off the West Bank for the start of Passover amid fears of further terrorist attacks after a bus bombing in Jerusalem that wounded 20 on April 18.

The closure began Thursday night and lasted through Saturday night.

Israel had "warnings, although not concrete" about terrorist attacks planned for the Passover weekend, Israel's Channel 10 reported, according to the Times of Israel. Israel is concerned about increased visits by Jews to the Temple Mount site during the eight-day Passover holiday, which began last Friday.

Six Israelis wounded in Monday's attack remain hospitalized, including a teenage girl in serious condition.

The victims of the bus bombing had burns on their upper bodies, as well as wounds from nails and ball bearings packed into the explosive device. The wounds, according to Avi Rivkind, head of Hadassah's trauma unit, were similar to those from previous Jerusalem terror attacks.

The bus bombing was a suicide terror attack planned by Hamas, and several members of the cell responsible were arrested.

The bomber was identified by the Shin Bet security service as Abed al-Hamid Abu Srour, a 19-year-old Palestinian from near Bethlehem in the West Bank. He was among the people injured in the attack on the No. 12 bus.

Abu Srour, who lost both of his legs in the explosion and underwent several surgeries, died at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem. Afterward, Hamas claimed in a statement that the teenager was a member of its military wing.

Several Hamas members from Bethlehem have been arrested on suspicion of helping Abu Srour carry out the attack, according to the Shin Bet. Their names remain under gag order.

Abu Srour's father denied that his son was a terrorist.

"I was not expecting that my son would do such act. My son did not make me feel even for one per cent, that he has feelings or thoughts like that. Never. I know that my son failed in one subject in his secondary schools exam and was preparing to take the exam again and pass it and focus on his future. This is the deal that we had together, me and him," Mohammad Abu Srour said, according to The Jerusalem Post.

The family discovered a will written by Abu Srour, according to the French news agency, AFP, which cited the Hamas-affiliated Palestinian Information Centre website. The Arabic website reported that Abu Srour's father had been asked to identify his son's body.

The Palestinian Ministry of Health later announced the body had been identified, according to the Palestinian Maan news agency.

The attack was the first bus bombing in Israel in several years. Such attacks terrorized Israelis during the second intifadah, a violent Palestinian uprising from 2000-2005.

The attack followed a six-month wave of Palestinian stabbings and shooting attacks in Jerusalem, the West Bank and across Israel. The rate of the attacks had slowed to normal levels, though Israeli officials remained concerned about a flare-up in violence surrounding upcoming religious holidays, including Passover. ■

At Ethiopian seder, 3,000 people long for Israel

MELANIE LIDMAN
GONDAR, ETHIOPIA

Members of the Falash Mura Jewish Ethiopian community prepare food for the Passover seder meal, in the synagogue in Gondar, Ethiopia.
MIRIAM ALSTER/FLASH90 PHOTO

It was the Bnei Akiva kids who started the dancing, of course, at the end of the Passover seder when we say "L'Shanah Haba'ah B'Yerushalayim – Next Year in Jerusalem." These children, who have been waiting for years to make aliyah to Israel, sang the words with passion, dancing in wild circles, jumping with their hands on each other's backs and hoisting the smaller kids onto their shoulders. One enterprising five-year-old stage-dived off the bimah (platform) into the crowd of dancers and was raised aloft.

The words "Next Year in Jerusalem" are bittersweet for Gondar's Jewish community. They capture moments of hope, but also decades of longing, countless frustrations, bureaucratic hurdles, the pain of family separation, and thousands of years of tradition. The Passover seder, which retells the story of the exodus from Egypt to Israel, from slavery to freedom, brings their struggle to become Israelis into sharp focus.

Some of the members of Gondar's 6,000-strong Jewish community have been waiting for upwards of 25 years to move to Israel, stuck in limbo as they watch the political wrangling in Israel from afar.

About 135,000 Jews of Ethiopian descent are living in Israel. Tens of thousands of Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel during Operation Moses in 1984 and Operation Solomon in 1992. Since that time, 50,000 additional Ethiopian Jews have made aliyah to Israel, at a rate of about 200 per month.

But there are still approximately 9,000 Jews left in Ethiopia, according to the community. The Jews still left in Ethiopia are called "Falash Mura," descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity generations ago, often under duress.

In November, Jews in Ethiopia celebrated the government's decision to approve the aliyah of 9,000 Ethiopian Jews. The approval faltered three months later when the Prime Minister's Office refused to implement the program because the $1 billion (US) needed to fund the absorption was not part of the budget. Funding was found and the aliyah was again approved on April 7.

The aliyah of the "last" 9,000 Jews is expected to begin in June and continue for approximately five years.

So the Passover seder last Friday for approximately 3,000 people in Gondar had a celebratory air, because many in the community believe that maybe this time, finally, they will be celebrating future Passover seders in Israel.

"You are not alone, people all over the world are thinking of you as they say the same words tonight," said Rabbi Menachem Waldman at the start of the seder. Waldman, a Haifa rabbi who has acted as the rabbi of the Jewish community in Ethiopia for the past 35 years, now works for the Jewish Agency. He mentioned the names of MKs who visit or support the community, including Likud MKs David Amsalem and Avraham Neguise, who refused to vote with the coalition for two months until the Knesset approved the plan to bring the 9,000 to Israel.

Waldman reminded the community that the Jewish Agency was again sponsoring the seder meal for the first time since it announced the "end" of Ethiopian aliyah in August 2013. And he told them that thousands of Jews around the world were advocating for the resumption of aliyah, the reunification of families stretched between Ethiopia and Israel.

A seder for 3,000 is chaotic, loud, boisterous, exciting. It required two weeks of preparation to hand-bake 50,000 matzot over the fire. Thursday was spent sweeping the dirt-floor synagogue from top to bottom, and Friday was for food preparation: boiling 2,000 eggs and 400kg of potatoes, crushing the peanut-date-banana mixture for haroset by hand with two large wooden mallets.

By early Friday afternoon, as the sun turned golden and the Ethiopian and Israeli flags fluttered in the breeze, the frantic preparations were at last completed.

People began arriving two hours in advance, women dressed in beautiful white shrouds and the children scrubbed clean and excited. Dozens of synagogue leaders worked all day on Friday to make "seder goody bags" for every participant, with a boiled potato, egg, piece of lettuce, and matzah. Perhaps the biggest miracle was that the bags were passed out more than three hours before the seder began, and almost no one, not even the smallest children, opened the bag for a pre-seder snack.

The evening began with Kabalat Shabbat services, since Passover began on Friday evening. As the crowd began to sing the traditional local Friday night song "Sambuse, Sambuse," the women broke out in ululations and the crowd went crazy, dancing and throwing their arms in the air.

It took community leaders a while to get everyone seated so Waldman could begin the seder.

As he ran through an abbreviated text – this is the bread of affliction, this is the bitter herb, this is the first cup of wine – people held the items aloft, a sea of boiled eggs raised throughout the synagogue. Around 50 children sang the Four Questions at the top of their lungs as the rest of the community clapped along.

The sweet homemade wine, made of 40 kilograms of raisins fermented in two large trash barrels for a week, was the biggest hit of the seder, with children clambering to get a cup.

A seder for 3,000 doesn't leave much room for deep discussions or reflections on the themes of Passover. But perhaps it's less about the words, and more about the reality of yearning for Israel, and hoping that this is the year their own exoduses will come to an end.

When the night ended with a singing of Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem, the mournful melody was transformed. It was a rousing chant shouted with resolution and strength. It was a promise, not a plea. And when they sang it, I couldn't help but tear up.

Because I live in Israel, I know that it is not the perfect place of their dreams, or of anyone's dreams. "Don't you know how difficult it will be for you when you arrive?" part of me wanted to tell them. "Don't you know that Israeli society can sometimes feature a bottled-up but commonplace racism that may try to erase your culture, change your name, deny you educational opportunities just because of the color of you skin? Don't you know about the racism, violence, and senseless terrorism that Israel faces from its enemies?"

And yet. No matter how difficult Israel can be, there are also moments of beauty that take your breath away. "I will miss Ethiopia, but even more, my soul now misses the Holy Land," one of the cantors in Ethiopia told me as he oversaw the preparation of matzah. And I understood.

At some point on Friday, almost every Jew in the world turned their thoughts towards a single place, Jerusalem, as they retold the story of the exodus from Egypt.

For the Jews of Ethiopia, these words are not a traditional story. They are a reality, a hope, a plea, a promise. This year we are slaves, next year let us be free. Now we are in our Egypt, but we have hope: Next Year in Jerusalem! ■

FILM | THEATRE | BOOKS | WHAT'S

This year's Hot Docs is the largest ever

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A revolutionary choreographer from Israel, a folk music family dynasty from Tajikistan and a gang of murderous neo-Nazis from Russia are among the subjects of the films at this year's Hot Docs festival in Toronto.

This is the biggest year in the documentary festival's history, with 232 titles set to premiere. Among them are non-fiction stories that should cater to Jewish interests in Toronto, including an insightful look at late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Rabin In His Own Words, which won a prize at the Haifa film festival, looks back at the life of the revered Israeli leader. Erez Laufer's film features rare interviews, recordings, home movies and family records with the late statesman – many of which have never been seen by the public. Rabin will also be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival later in May.

"I learned a lot from that documentary," says Shane Smith, Hot Docs' new director of programming. "It's always great to have this perspective on people or issues or moments coming 20 years later."

Smith also highly recommends Credit for Murder, a dark, true crime thriller from Israeli filmmaker Vladi Antonevicz. In the doc, the director goes undercover as a white supremacist to investigate a brutal hate crime and find the Russian neo-Nazis responsible.

"The resolution is quite shocking, so I don't want to say too much about it," Smith says of the documentary. "But it's quite the ride."

Antonevicz's film could stir up discussion, as could Ferne Pearlstein's documentary The Last Laugh, unveiled as one of the festival's Special Presentations. The film delves into a provocative subject related to the Holocaust: is it ever a good idea to make jokes about the tragedy?

Pearlstein's film, which features appearances by Mel Brooks, Carl Reiner, Sarah Silverman and several Holocaust survivors, may deal with a sensitive topic, but little of it is in bad taste, Smith says. Pearlstein will be present to talk about the film after it premieres on May 1.

Other special guests to Hot Docs include the subjects at the heart of the poignant Aida's Secrets. In this doc, which will have its world premiere at the festival, Izak Sagi, who was born in the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp, unites with brother Shep Shell for the first time at the age of 68. The film looks at family secrets and issues related to identity.

> There are no films screening that tackle the contemporary Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Meanwhile, the fascinating Alaev family – featured in world premiere The Wonderful Kingdom of Papa Alaev – will also appear in Toronto. The doc is about a celebrated family of folk musicians who immigrate to Israel from Tajikistan. Although the father, Allo "Papa" Alaev, leads the band and rules the household, he gets pushback from his only daughter, Ada.

"It's kind of like a family business story when the younger generation grows up and wants to change things," Smith says, "and the older generation isn't ready to let go."

Another big arts-related premiere is Mr. Gaga, a striking look at uncompromising Israeli choreographer Ohad Naharin. Filmmaker Tomer Heymann spent eight years researching and following Naharin before beginning work on the doc, which explores life behind the scenes of Tel Aviv's Batsheva Dance Company.

Despite the numerous titles with a Jewish interest, there are no films screening at Hot Docs this year that tackle the contemporary Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Smith says that could be a reflection on the slate of films that was submitted to the festival. Fewer than 10 per cent of the films entered for submission will actually screen at Hot Docs.

"It all depends on the year," Smith says. "I think, in particular with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, it's easy for everybody to feel fatigued or to feel like they've seen this topic or subject before." ■

The Hot Docs festival runs in Toronto from April 28 through May 8.

Natasha :

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

In one particularly affecting scene from David Bezmozgis' Natasha, the film the Canadian author and filmmaker adapted from the title short story of his acclaimed first collection, the teenaged protagonist Mark is reading aloud excerpts from Nietzsche to his 14-year-old step-cousin Natasha, newly arrived from Moscow.

After listening contemplatively to several passages, Natasha observes, "So he writes things that everyone already knows."

"Kind of," Mark replies. "But you only know them when you read them."

The statement encapsulates the poignancy at the heart of the film, which Bezmozgis wrote and directed, and which opens this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 5.

The universe of 16-year-old Mark (played by Alex Ozerov)'s placid Toronto suburb is rattled when the troubled daughter of his uncle's new wife is temporarily placed under his charge.

But it's only when he's forced to face certain irrevocable truths about Natasha (played by Sasha K. Gordon), his family and himself that it seems they were there to be understood all along.

Mark, like Bezmozgis, was born in Latvia to Jewish parents and raised in Toronto, where his family settled when he was a young child.

The cultural rift between Mark and his parents, as well as the extended Russian family members of their generation, is starkly highlighted. Mark responds in English when they speak to him in Russian and challenges their notion that he should spend the summer working, as they're anxious that their children "have it too easy" in Canada.

a poignant coming-of-age story

Rather than toil at the call-centre job his uncle has arranged for him, Mark forges ahead with his comfortable routine of riding his bike, delivering pot for his older neighbour – it pays more or less the same as a thankless summer job would, he reasons – reading philosophy in his basement-turned bedroom and watching porn.

In addition to underscoring the particular strains of the Russian-Jewish immigrant experience and the understated pleasures of a lazy suburban summer, Bezmozgis deftly exposes some of the universal ironies of the parent-child dynamic.

The various parents in the film berate their adolescent children for being selfish, idle and difficult, but their claims are juxtaposed by revelations of their own foibles and in some cases, corruption.

Mark's mother's almost childlike innocence, with her refusal to see the drama unfolding before her, throws into sharp relief Mark's rather dramatic coming of age. Meanwhile, Natasha's mother, the new wife of Mark's uncle, is crafty and duplicitous, while the husband she dupes is perhaps less a victim than he initially seems to be.

Natasha, whose own innocence it seems has long ago been lost, uses the grim lessons she's learned from growing up in a dysfunctional home in Russia – a country about which she says blandly, "It's s--t, but people enjoy themselves" – to survive in the only way she knows how.

The cynical reality of her situation as a child who comes to understand that sexuality is her most valued currency is balanced by the surprising sweetness of the romance she and Mark enter into. Indeed, it is in portraying the budding relationship between them that Bezmozgis triumphs.

The adult characters in the film are decidedly weaker than their adolescent counterparts, with their dialogue sometimes veering toward being heavy-handed. Bezmozgis is perhaps reaching here by using them to give viewers background narrative that's woven so gracefully into the book.

The teenage characters in the film, however, are beautifully rendered, at once capturing the shy watchfulness of those on the brink of adulthood and the joyous freedom of newfound independence.

Both Ozerov and Gordon are excellent as Mark and Natasha, playing their roles with an effortless intensity that makes the film a pleasure to watch. ■

Caregiver Burnout and the Passover Lesson

In over forty years experience in the field of Senior's Healthcare, family and friends have often consulted me as a resource and have asked me, "When our parent/loved one needs more care, what should we do?" For the same forty years, my answer has been, "If you can afford it, the best solution is to keep them in the home environment with around-the-clock help" – that is, until now. Recently during intake and assessments at One Kenton Place, I have encountered families suffering from caregiver "burnout". Notwithstanding that they already have help 24/7, the parent/loved one's condition and quality of life continues to deteriorate. A dilemma that needs some thought.

With Passover thoughts in mind, it seemed to me the demands and challenges of being the primary caregiver/decision-maker for someone with complex needs is a burden that can be likened to bondage. The Passover story deals with the freedom from bondage and hopefully there is a lesson to be learned from the Pesach experience. The Passover meal is so different from other holiday meals spent with family and to quote "Why is this night different than any other night?" The answer is "SEDER" or ORDER. Following a routine of prescribed steps ensures the delivery of the proper Passover experience for participants of all ages.

So too, for the primary caregiver, ORDER or disciplined and monitored routines need to be in place in order to orchestrate, augment and enrich what the hands-on caregivers do for your loved one. That includes balanced and planned meals, exercise, music (either listening and/or singing) mental games, conversation and storytelling, shopping, looking at family photos, hobbies, current events, even some TV shows, and really anything that engages and stimulates the individual being cared for. Some families are even hiring outside professionals to assist them with specialized services like these and safety proofing the home. The ORDER within the daily programming can lessen the burden and stem some of the depressive side effects of isolation. What results is not necessarily freedom from bondage but rewards from a labour of love.

A tale of two cities

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Evan Placey

Scarborough, U.K., is nothing like Scarborough, Ont. Unlike the urban area in the east end of Toronto, Scarborough – in Yorkshire County – is an idyllic seaside town that's a popular summertime tourist destination. And Canadian-British playwright Evan Placey is familiar with both places.

His partner's parents are from the Scarborough across the pond and he's from the GTA. That's why he set his latest play Scarberia – on now at Toronto's Young People's Theatre (YPT) - in these twin cities of sorts.

"I became really fascinated right from the first time we went to visit his parents, like 10 years ago," says Placey, who grew up in Thornhill, Ont., and moved to the U.K. in 2006.

"I was like this is nothing like Scarborough in Toronto near where I grew up. And I became sort of fascinated with the link between these two places," he continues.

Scarberia, directed by Nina Lee Aquino, follows two sets of boys – played by the same two actors (Shelly Antony and Mishka Thébaud) – after a girl goes missing in Toronto and the body of a woman washes ashore in the U.K. Placey describes the play as a thriller.

As the show switches between the two Scarboroughs, it explores why some young people get into violence as well as larger themes such as identity, loyalty, love and friendship. Placey calls it a coming-of-age story.

He also works with ideas related to quantum physics, including the notion of multiple dimensions. "The form of the play plays with this idea around astral twins, and are the two boys in Scarborough just versions of the same two boys in the U.K.?" Placey says.

As Placey wrote in the Guardian last November, it's important for him to create engaging plays that challenge young people. The characters in Scarberia, he notes, live in a messy world that's filled with gangs and violence. And along with that provocative content, Placey notes its form is demanding as well.

"Let's make the audience work a bit to really sort of explore for them what theatre can be," Placey says.

The sole female character (Alejandra Simmons), for instance, speaks only in verse. Placey's also introducing young, Canadian audiences to a side of British life they don't usually see. "When we did the workshop here, one of the young people in the audience said, 'Oh, I never realized that not all the people in England were like rich and posh,'" he recalls.

> Let's make the audience work a bit to really sort of explore for them what theatre can be.

He started working on the play in the U.K. and once YPT got involved, he developed it at the Banff Playwrights Colony.

As part of his research process, he set up a pen pal program between high schools in Toronto – Earl Haig in North York and Scarborough's R.H. King Academy – and two schools in Yorkshire.

Scarberia is also a way for him to explore his multifaceted identity – he's both Canadian and British. "It's not like some of my other plays, it doesn't have a strong Jewish theme," he says.

Yet his Judaism still plays into this piece. "I think it always goes back to the idea of, for me, being an outsider and what does it mean to be an outsider."

Both sets of boys in Scarberia feel isolated in their respective hometowns and that's a feeling Placey's familiar with. "In the U.K. and in Europe, it's hard to be a Jew," he says, "especially at the moment."■

Scarberia is recommended for ages 14 and up. It runs until May 1 at the Young People's Theatre.

Windsor film festival offers variety of themes

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The 14th annual edition of the Windsor Jewish Film Festival runs May 2 to 5 this year.

It will show 10 films, opening with Canadian director Atom Egoyan's Remember, starring multiple Oscar-winner Christopher Plummer. It closes with Labyrinth of Lies, a German film that explores how that country's first domestic war crimes trial came about, a decade after the Nuremberg trials.

Jewish film festivals may be commonplace in larger cities, but Windsor, with a population of 200,000 and a Jewish community of 1,200, was one of the early rare examples of a small community running its own public film event.

Festival spokesman and retired University of Windsor professor Stuart Selby said than when the festival started, "we may have been second only to Toronto," though now there are several Jewish film festivals in cities across Canada.

The Windsor festival originally was part of the Detroit Jewish film festival, a "fourth location," if you will, across the border, Selby said. But, because of copyright issues, films shown in Canada had to be sourced from Canadian distributors.

"So at that point we said let's just do it ourselves – with trepidation – but it worked out."

All festival films are screened at the Cineplex Devonshire Mall, rented at a reduced rate. Last year, the event attracted more than 2,000, a testament to its growing popularity among the Windsor community at large.

Selby said a lot of the growth has been through word of mouth. "It's when people tell their friends, 'Hey, we saw a great film, let's go together this year.'"

To put on the festival, a scheduling committee chooses from about 30 mostly recently released films, often screened at other festivals or listed in film distributors' current catalogues.

"The whole process of previewing films has become a lot simpler because the distributors will either send screener DVDs or they'll send it digitally," Selby said.

But choosing films can be a bit tricky.

While organizers seek a mix of topics, it's a fact of life that the preponderance of Jewish films are Holocaust-themed.

Co-chairs Helen Arbour, left, and Nancy Barat

And while many of those are, of course, screened at the festival, films with other themes, be it the immigrant experience or contemporary Jewish life, are also sought.

"We're always looking for light-hearted films and they're rare," Selby says.

But this year's selection demonstrates that even films about the Holocaust can be nuanced and don't necessarily have to take place during World War II.

"While several touch on the Holocaust, all avoid images of the horror of that time, confronting instead the lingering psychological effects on people's lives," the festival says in a release.

In Remember, nominated for three Canadian Screen Awards this year, an aged nursing home resident with dementia overcomes his disability to avenge the murder of his friend's family in Auschwitz. And in Magic Men, a child survivor of the Greek Holocaust returns 60 years later with his estranged son to find his rescuer.

Other films in the lineup show considerable diversity.

Dough is about the last kosher baker in East London, who takes on a Muslim Darfur refugee as an apprentice, leading to some humorous cultural clashes. The Dove Flyer is set in the 1950s Jewish community in Iraq. A Tale of Love and Darkness starring Natalie Portman is based on the Amos Oz memoir about growing up in Jerusalem from the British Mandate period to independence. Deli Man is a delightful, bittersweet chronicle of the once ubiquitous but increasingly scarce Jewish delicatessen. ■

Feel free to use these tips at next year's seders

Chaimie and Leizer

With Passover behind us, we realize many of you did your seders wrong this year. Here's how to get it right next year.

Passover's crown jewel is the seder. We of course have two, so if you futz it up one night, you can get it right the next (take it easy on the Mani, will ya?). Now, this one is going to be particularly hard for us Canadians, since there are no Canadian teams to watch in the NHL playoffs this year – during Maggid on an extended trip to the toilet. As good people though, we've learned from Passover that it's important to let our people go, and thus we've agreed to let the majority of Canadian players on U.S. teams wear playoff Omer beards (a shandeh, but nu, what can you do?).

Anyway, if you're like us, you recognize that in modern times, Passover can very much be a figurative exploration of freedom and tolerance, so doing the Haggadah by the book, as it were, now becomes open to some 21st-century interpretation.

This leads to the proverbial YidLife Crisis: which rituals and elements are worth keeping and which are worth "passing over"? Fear not! We want to give you highlights from our very own YidLife Crisis Haggadah.

Kadesh: Feel free to silently praise that for which you are most grateful in whatever language you choose. Our personal choice: Bill Murray, in Aramaic. To each their own.

Urchatz: In our seder, hand sanitizer is perfectly acceptable, as long as you make sure to sanitize your hands before delivering the hand sanitizer. Be careful about talking during this time – anything you say while cleaning your hands can and will be used against you.

Carpas: Fun fact: Why bother with celery? Go for a pickle. Don't hold back. We were once in a pickle in Egypt. Now, let the pickle be within us.

Yachatz: We see this as being about breaking up in general, and you can achieve this by breaking up with your spouse. In lieu of hiding the afikoman, hide your holdings in Panama. After all, doesn't Mossack Fonseca sound like a cherished historical imprint of a Sephardi Haggadah?

Maggid: This is the meat and potatoes, figuratively speaking, before you get the payoff – the literal meat and potatoes. So it's important to enter this stage of the marathon with oomph and build appetite for the meal. We not only encourage four questions from the youngest in the room, but also additional questions from the second- and third-youngest, like, "What makes her so special?" and "Was I also an accident, mom and dad?"

During Maggid, feel free to come up with your own proprietary contractions for the plagues, e.g., rabbis Leizer and Chaimie were known to have contracted the plagues into the following nonsensical acronyms: Machash, Gevosh, Dachitz, Khardash. (They were also known to have contracted some of the plagues. Prognosis negative.)

Rachtzah: Sanitizer is once again fine for cleaning, but, symbolically, voluntary disclosure with tax agencies is also accepted at this point in the seder. (Fun fact: they have 24-hour hotlines.)

Motzi Matzah: Eat the matzah, but this time, try to taste it. Still nothing, eh? Stands the test of time.

Maror: If you find it hard to eat bitter foods, full-season recaps of the 2015-16 Habs' or Leafs' seasons are perfectly acceptable alternatives this year.

Korech: We don't know why anyone hasn't tried lean smoked meat between two pieces of matzah, but God willing, you will next year.

Shulchan Orech: Ya made it buddy! Open up your belt, catch up on those wine glasses and celebrate your improbable success. While the weak lie passed out around you, you've earned your bounty!

Tzafun: The notion of matzah-as-dessert could make one so bitter that in our seder, you're allowed to skip maror the following night.

Barech: Here you can say grace and give praise for this splendiferous meal. Or you can go to the bathroom and thoroughly barech.

Hallel: Fill Elijah's cup. Valuable cost-saving tip: Don't wait for him to say "when."

Nirtzah: Congratulations! The bondage is over and you can return to your usual life of trivial work and mindless obsession with people's responses to your social media posts.

To paraphrase the Haggadah, remember that in each generation, we must see ourselves as the guys who compiled the first Haggadah and figure out how to do it ourselves, optimizing the ratio of freedom and comfort to guilt, obligation, and family. Amen v'amen! ■

Monstrous explores mixed race identities

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish/Afro-Caribbean artist, performer and playwright Sarah Waisvisz, 34, will be presenting her one-woman show, Monstrous, which explores the often ignored mixed race identity based on her own personal experiences, and her work on her PhD thesis research about Francophone/Anglophone literature specifically by Afro/Caribbean women.

Monstrous made its world premiere in February in Waisvisz's hometown of Ottawa during the Undercurrent Festival. It will make its Toronto premiere on May 5, 8 p.m. at Toronto's Artscape Wychwood Barns as part of the 14th Annual rock.paper.sistahz – a black, indigenous and multicultural festival featuring new works based on social issues examined in new and unusual ways. The festival runs from May 3-5.

The 65-minute play, directed by Eleanor Crowder, encompasses, dance, song and projections. "The story is about my own experiences of being of mixed race and cultural background. The play is a quest, it is me trying to figure out who I am and who my family is. There's some secrets, there's some weird stories and some unbelievable facts.

"The play comes from the premise that I know a lot more about my Jewish and European ancestry, but not a lot of my Afro-Caribbean ancestry," says Waisvisz, whose maternal grandmother is French Swiss with roots in Hungary. She was secretly Jewish.

Waisvisz's maternal grandfather was a non-Jew from Martinique with roots from the west coast of Africa. Her father's family is from Holland with both Sephardi and Ashkenazi lines, in addition to a link to Dutch Indonesia. Add to the mix, the playwright was born in Germany while her father was working abroad for the Canadian government.

She says the play is an autobiography that allows her to figure out who she is. At the same time, she uncovers certain issues on multiculturalism in Canada and overtly questions herself in the play, about if she has a right to tell the story of the Afro-Caribbean side of her family, since by now, she says it is really diluted.

"One of the other key questions is a response to questions I get all the time as to where I'm from: why do you look strange, what it your background, define yourself?" says Waisvisz. "It is about trying to figure out who we are and also realizing that perception changes depending on who is looking at us."

Waisvisz says this is a play about Jews of colour, about the non-white, non-Ashkenazi Jewish experience which is already in our community and in our culture. "So often in North America in our diaspora we tend to equate Jewishness with white European but that is not the whole story," she explains. "There are people like me who have ancestry from a complex collection of backgrounds, or Jews of colour who have been adopted into families, or Mizrahi Jews who read as Arab, Indian Jews, Chinese Jews and Jews in the Caribbean.

"I would like Jewish audiences to see in the story, a reflection of their own questions of diaspora, exile and immigration. Many of the Jewish people who have seen the play have resonated at the core with some of my messages and the questions I bring up about belonging from a Jewish perspective."

In addition to being an academic, playwright, director, and multi-disciplinary performer, she has training in dance and physical theatre including classical ballet, puppetry, acrobatics, and stilts. Recent performance credits include The Glass Menagerie, My Name is Asher Lev, and This Is a Very Old Story, to name a few. This is not her first foray into playwriting. Her first, co-written and performed by Bronwyn Steinberg, is called Occupy Me, an interactive play about a yoga teacher's quest for either activism or spirituality inflected with Jewish questions, while she leads the audience on a yoga class and a journey. She is currently working on Heartlines, based on a true story about two French women during World War II, surrealist artists who were lovers, and worked for the resistance.

There are hopes to tour the show. Monstrous will be performed again in Ottawa on Aug. 3 at the Ottawa Jewish Community Centre.

Waisvisz is an active member of the Ottawa Reconstructionist congregation Or Haneshamah, and has a regular column for the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin called Dispatches from the Diaspora. ■

Passover installation in Makom's new space asks thought-provoking questions

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

From an artist's perspective, Passover can be source of inspiration, says Toronto curator and artist Evelyn Tauben.

"It's a holiday that intersects with very tactile, performative activities, and these really lend themselves to art-making," she explained, referring to the items that traditionally comprise the Passover seder plate, and the various meanings behind them.

"We don't just tell a story, we do it with these props that we eat, touch and smell," added Tauben, who several years ago left a position as head of programs and exhibitions at the Koffler Centre of the Arts to work as an independent curator and producer, primarily with Jewish artists. (She also writes a monthly arts and culture column in these pages).

Tauben recently teamed up with local architect and artist Joanne Frisch to create a Passover-themed installation in the window of the storefront space serving as the new home of Makom, the grassroots, downtown and progressive Jewish community of which both are active members.

The installation features a collection of cardboard boxes, several of which are affixed with colourful papers spelling the Hebrew names of the seder plate components, and six that bear, in neon pink lettering, questions that Tauben said she and Frisch came up with, inspired by the items on the plate.

> We thought of the installation as a kind of deconstructed seder plate.

"We thought of the installation as a kind of deconstructed seder plate," she explained. "The questions range from philosophical to thought-provoking to playful and provide a different way of thinking about the seder plate foods."

For instance, the question inspired by the egg, which is said to symbolize rebirth is, "Why were you born?" while the shankbone, which represents the Pesach sacrifice to God, inspired the broader question, "What's your sacrifice?"

While seder plate symbols are intended to prompt conversation, Tauben said the process can become rote when repeated in the same way each year.

"With the Zroah [shank bone] for example... it's not that easy to connect to the idea of a sacrifice today. So on a more philosophical level we can ask, 'What is your sacrifice?' and turn it into a more personal, introspective conversation."

Prior to moving into the new building last month, Makom – whose mission is to offer inclusive and diverse opportunities for Jewish learning, ritual, arts and culture – has been largely nomadic, with its weekly Friday night services and other programs held at various community and private venues.

The space, which is located on College Street just east of Bathurst Street, previously served as the private studio of artist and Makom member Rochelle Rubinstein, who frequently used the front window to exhibit the work of other artists. Rubinstein now rents the space to Makom.

Inside, it's an open concept esthetic, a large room where Makom's founding director and leader Rabbi Aaron Levy and the new director of education and family programming Rabbi Julia Appel have desks and where there's an assortment of found furniture and bookshelves lined with Judaica.

Rabbi Levy said the space gives the organization a greater sense of stability, and has already been used for four weeks of Friday night services, as well as for a bar mitzvah.

In addition, there's a basement refurbished as a kid's playroom, a kosher, vegetarian kitchen and a garden where Rabbi Levy said he hopes people will be able to daven, eat or hold programs in good weather.

"Having our own storefront gives us the opportunity to do more programming, because we'll no longer have to look for a place to hold each program. But it also gives Makom greater visibility," Rabbi Levy said. "In the short time we've been here, we've already had lots of people poking their head in and going, 'What is this place?'"

To continue Rubinstein's practice of using the front window for installations, Tauben will be taking the lead on seeking funding to enable different artists to showcase their work there.

"I like the idea of giving a platform to local Jewish artists but also of collaborating with all kinds of artists, and giving them some kind of prompt as a point of connection to Jewish values or ideas," she said. ■

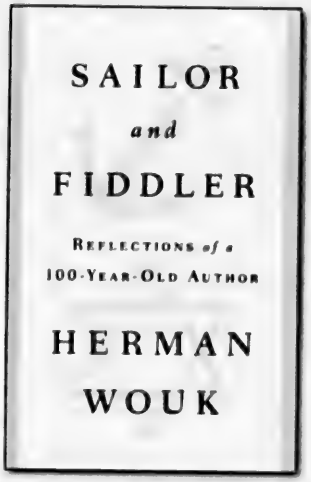
Wouk 'non-autobiography' a cap to accomplished career

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Sailor and Fiddler: Reflections of a 100-Year-old Author
by Herman Wouk
Simon & Schuster

This slim volume, which the author describes as a "non-autobiography," will be of special interest to people interested in literature, for it focuses primarily on Herman Wouk's writing life and how he came to create such popular works as The Caine Mutiny, Marjorie Morningstar, Youngblood Hawke, The Winds of War, and War and Remembrance, among a stream of other novels, non-fiction books and plays.

For a writer known for pounding out words profusely from a typewriter, Wouk is remarkably restrained here, and he uses mental shorthand and telegraphic allusions to compress his remarks even further. Yet despite the terseness and overall inadequacy of these pages to stand in as an autobiography, they are filled with revelations – not the least of which is that the 100-year-old literary progenitor is still on this side of the turf.

Unlike the proverbial old soldier, Wouk evidently prefers not to fade away into that good night. In actual fact he was never a soldier. He sidestepped a WWII US Army draft notice and joined the navy instead – hence the "sailor" of the title. It was the comedian Fred Allen, for whom Wouk had been ghostwriting for five years, who typed a funny letter recommending him as a naval officer that led to this momentous turn of fate. During his time in the South Pacific, he wrote a first novel, Aurora Dawn, and ultimately poured the experience into the highly successful The Caine Mutiny.

Readers who appreciate writerly insights will enjoy such spare passages as the following: "I [wrote] The Caine Mutiny in a year, which I can now scarcely believe. As John Steinbeck said of his quickly written early work, 'I was hungry then.' I read the book to my wife chapter by chapter as I wrote it. At one point she remarked, 'If they don't like this one, you had better try another line of business.'" The book came out in 1951, won the Pulitzer Prize, and dominated the best-seller lists for nearly two years.

Marjorie Morningstar was "an indigestible monster of overwriting," according to one editor, but another pre-publication opinion averred that Wouk should not remove a word of it. Book reviewers were equally of two minds, but that didn't stop Time magazine from putting Wouk on the cover in 1955. That's when Allen told him, "Just remember this. For every step you take up the ladder of success, you will get a prick from the porcupine of grief." Marjorie Morningstar was said to be the first major novel about American Jewry.

Wouk was in the middle of writing Youngblood Hawke – "The pages had piled up, I had a book-length script in hand, yet I felt the story was just getting started" – when his wife-mentor-agent informed him he would be writing about Europe instead. Deeply impressed and moved by Raul Hilberg's "masterpiece" The Destruction of the European Jews, Wouk met Hilberg at the University of Vermont; Hilberg convinced him he had to go to Germany– a place Wouk had resolved never to set foot in – to begin research on what would become his "main task."

Wouk had set his sights on a big war novel with the Holocaust at its centre; the project ultimately became the two monumental books, The Winds of War and War and Remembrance. "The main task I had set for myself was to bring the Holocaust to life in a frame of global war," he writes. The two books became bestsellers and were the basis for two huge television mini-series.

In the "fiddler" section of Sailor and Fiddler, Wouk offers background to his various books set in Israel and on Jewish and humorous themes and topics. ("Fiddler" is a shorthand reference to the legendary Sholem Aleichem.) His books The Hope and The Glory, for instance, deal with Israel and the Arab wars; in the latter, the American David Goodkind visits his ailing mother in Israel and returns with a vital diplomatic message from Golda Meir to president Richard Nixon at the height of the Watergate crisis. Wouk is also the author of This Is My God, a popular summary of key aspects of Judaism that came out in 1959.

Wouk had read of an Israeli colonel who rushed home early from his honeymoon in Nepal, arrived back in Israel on the war's second day, and rushed to a battle front in the Golan Heights. Wouk made official requests to find this colonel but was stymied and stonewalled at every turn. Then he asked a retired military friend, who laughed and said, "Why didn't you ask me first? He's my cousin." He met the heroic colonel and wrote about him in his non-fiction book, The Will to Live On.

Because of his illustrious career, Wouk encountered a spectrum of prominent personalities from actors and directors to presidents. The British philosopher Isaiah Berlin once encouraged him to write an autobiography because "you've traveled, you've known many people, you have interesting ideas, it would do a lot of good." For whatever reason, perhaps because he left it too late, Wouk has left dozens of his unedited journals for his sons to pore over and publish in their own good time. In the meantime, we get Sailor and Fiddler, which, for all its richness, is really a poor substitute.

Perhaps as befits a man of 100 with only precious time at his disposal, Wouk gives us fleeting, telling glances of a few VIPs, such as then president Lyndon Johnson when Wouk served for a spell as White House speechwriter. "One memory of this odd swift passage will be with me until I die," he writes, and describes encountering Johnson with two advisers in an anteroom reading a long dispatch, supposedly from Vietnam, and bad. "Lyndon Johnson happened once to glance up and meet my look. The cold veiled eyes of a master politician scared me."

The book also features a tiny cameo of Charles Laughton and a few other celebrities. We are also given the spare but lovely outline of Wouk's wife and guiding light through nearly seven decades of marriage. But these reflections are mostly professional, not personal, in nature. Wouk informs us in a sentence of the shocking drowning death of a young son, then peremptorily moves on.

Reading between the lines, readers will discern certain inescapable facts. First, Wouk must have been a smart and voracious reader, for he seems to know literature inside out, a prerequisite for many a good writer. Second, he worked hard and long, since he seems to have written industriously and copiously, moving from one project to the next with hardly an idle moment in between. He enjoyed an envious success that included bestselling books, a big Broadway drama, and huge television miniseries. In all, Sailor and Fiddler is a small but fitting cap to a long and accomplished career. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

We owe it to our kids to expose sexual predators

Lauren Kramer

Growing up in Cape Town, South Africa, rabbis came and left my synagogue over the years. Eventually, a lay leader who had previously led the choir adopted the role of cantor and slipped into leading services.

A tall, moustachioed man, the cantor had a beautiful voice, and I loved hearing his deep baritone soar through the pews. He had a special smile for me, and after services on Saturday mornings, he'd come over to wish me and my parents a "Gut Shabbos." Sometimes he'd shower me with compliments, and being an awkward teen on the verge of womanhood, I admit I enjoyed the attention.

"Look at that peaches-and-cream complexion," he'd declare exuberantly to my parents. "She's gorgeous, your daughter! But why is she drinking Diet Coke, may I ask? With a figure like that, there's no need for the diet version!"

Which parent doesn't enjoy hearing their kid praised, particularly by a person who occupies a high rank in the community? We thought nothing of it at the time.

But a couple of years later, after my mother had undergone minor surgery, the cantor paid a house visit and found time to sit down with me for a cup of tea. I remember wondering why he wanted to sit with me, of all people. The answer became quickly apparent.

"Do you believe a young woman like yourself could fall in love with someone much older?" he asked.

The question came out of left field. At 15, I'd never considered the possibility, and it seemed utterly preposterous.

"Never," I declared, my stomach turning at the thought of his 40-something whiskers grazing my skin. What could I ever want with an older, married man like him?

Young and naive, I figured the subject was closed. I needed a ride down the road that day, and the cantor was glad to oblige. But on the way, as I sat next to him in the passenger's seat, the cantor placed his large, hairy hand on my thigh. It landed close to the panty line, far too close to be imagined as anything other than a direct advance. For a second, I was stunned into silence. This, I realized, was where the smiles from the bimah, the compliments to my figure and skin tone had been leading. I fled the car and raced home.

> I remember wondering why he wanted to sit with me, of all people.

When I told my parents, my mom's face creased into worried concern, but my father's response shocked and disappointed me. "I saw you smile at him. You asked for it," he said in a threatening voice. Deep down I knew I'd never asked for anything, and luckily for me, nothing had actually happened. Or had it?

I've wondered about that over the quarter century that's passed. Who should we have told about the inappropriate questions, that transgressing hand on my thigh? Was I the only teen he made a pass at, or were there others who didn't reject his advances? Did we have a responsibility to come forward, or were we right to bury this in the family and never mention it again?

I don't know whom we might have told or whether they'd have believed us enough to ensure there were repercussions. But stories about "holy" Jewish men who tarnished their titles with sexually deviant, morally unethical behaviour are coming out of the woodwork these days. By making these stories heard, perhaps we can raise a generation of kids who won't trust blindly in religious titles, long beards and black garb, and who won't think prayerful worship is a firm guarantee of appropriate behaviour.

Are there grown women in the community today who bear scars inflicted by so-called "holy men" who abused their trust, took advantage of their innocence? I suspect there are, and it's high time we heard their stories. Exposure is the best – perhaps the only – form of protection. We owe it to our kids. ■

Celebrating Benjamin Brown

A first-ever exhibition featuring Benjamin Brown (1890 – 1974), one of Toronto's most significant architects of the early 20th century, was presented by The Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre. Brown's lasting impact on Toronto's architectural heritage include the Balfour and Tower Buildings, the Hermant Building, the Primrose Club and Beth Jacob Synagogue. Renowned architect Jack Diamond spoke eloquently on the significance of Brown's buildings to Toronto's heritage. Guests were treated to a comprehensive exhibit of Brown's work including a short film on how Brown's buildings stand as testaments to the past even as they are re-purposed for today. ■ – The Socialite

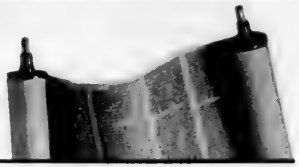
Pesach | Deuteronomy 14:22-16:17; Numbers 28:19-25



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier ask whether all the work preparing for Passover is really worth it
Rabbi Denise Handlarski analyzes Shir Hashirim and the connection between Pesach and fertility
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen explains the unique significance and customs tied to the final days of the holiday

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

We have reached the point of Passover when there is nothing left to complain about. The pre-Passover stress, domestic duties and money spent are but a distant memory. Is all that work preparing for Pesach really worth it?

In past years, one of our guests likened the late-night seder experience at our home to a marathon. He shared that the lengthy discussion, meal and singing – mostly unfamiliar to him from his past Passover experiences – was quite gruelling, but he embraced the experience for the sense of accomplishment he felt at the end.

Perhaps this feeling of accomplishment is what inspires us during these waning days of Passover.

The Talmud (Berachot 5a) teaches that God gave the Jewish People three good gifts – the Torah, the Land of Israel and the world to come. These gifts, though, according to the Talmud, were given only with yisurin, or suffering.

What kind of gift is one that is only given with pain? Is that even considered a gift at all?

No doubt the work for Passover reminds us of the Israelites as they prepared and ate their Passover sacrifice – their meal of redemption. The dedication they gave this mitzvah was a sign of their commitment to God and to the Jewish People.

We live in a time when we expect instant results and answers. Passover reminds us that education – knowing, feeling and teaching our Jewish story – is not immediate. While we might have more creative, inclusive and exciting ways to learn, the process of learning still requires the serious investment of time and energy.

The Passover domestic upheaval of changing the dishes and food is a physical act that can achieve lofty spiritual goals. Each year, we learn anew our capacity to change, our desire for accomplishment and that the best gifts are the ones for which we work hard. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

At Pesach we read the Shir Hashirim (Song of Songs), which is a piece of beautiful poetry that has been included in our biblical literature. The Shir Hashirim is one of my favourite parts of Tanach for its richness in language and theme.

It is surprising to some that it made it into our canon at all, for it is, in essence, erotic poetry. There are numerous examples of natural imagery in the poem, many of which are tied to the love the speakers have for one another. For example: "Come my beloved,/ Let us go into the open;/ Let us lodge among the henna shrubs./ Let us go early to the vineyards;/ Let us see if the vine has flowered,/ If its blossoms have opened,/ If the pomegranates are in bloom./ There I will give my love to you."

While some in the rabbinic tradition have argued that the lovers are metaphorical: for God and Israel (the people, or sometimes, the land), I believe it can stand as a piece of poetry depicting human love. If our Tanach, our biblical literature, can serve as a guide to humanity, it makes sense that it would contain human themes such as love and sexuality. While these themes have made some readers uncomfortable, others have advocated for their necessity. Rabbi Akiva is said to have called the Shir Hashirim the "Holy of Holies" of texts.

To me, its worth is precisely in its location in human relationships and the natural world. The beautiful language reflects the beauty of the world and the love we may each experience in our own lives. It is a call to what is most special and precious about earth and humanity. At Pesach, we think of renewal, of fertility and of springtime. What better text to ground us in the fecundity and beauty of life? ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is spiritual leader of Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

The seventh day of Pesach commemorates the splitting of the Red Sea and the Exodus from Egypt. Our sages consider these two events to be so fundamental that they require us to recall them every day. This obligation indicates that they reflect two constant and relevant stages of our service to God.

The word "Mitzrayim" (Hebrew for Egypt) means "limitation," so to "leave Egypt," means to transcend our limitations that prevent us from using our full God-given potential. A Jew can be truly free when he fulfils Torah and mitzvot. When a Jew is not influenced by the material world and fulfils mitzvot, he is free from "slavery."

Moses led the men in song and Miriam led the women in more songs of thanks, with tambourines and drums. The women had more faith than the men.

From the Haftorah for the last days of Pesach, which deals with redemption, we see that these two days are connected with Mashiach. The Haftorah describes how the wolf will live with the lamb, among other things.

This is why the 17th-century rabbi, the Baal Shem Tov had a third meal on the last day of Pesach – because on this day the radiance of the Mashiach is revealed within every Jew.

The fifth Lubavitcher Rebbe asked that on the last day Pesach, we also drink four cups of wine and eat matzah, because this strengthens our faith as we plunge back into the world. The tasteless matzah symbolizes selfless humility. Wine, by contrast, is pleasurable. We drink, and thus internalize our faith.

There is another beautiful custom among Sephardi Jews who, at the end of Pesach, celebrate the "Mimouna," from the word "emuna," faith. May God help every Jew to overcome all difficulties and have true freedom, through Torah and mitzvot!

Chag Samayach! ■

Ambassador Vivian Bercovici on Canada's ties with Israel

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In January 2014, then-foreign affairs minister John Baird surprised many when he named Vivian Bercovici as Canada's ambassador to Israel. A Toronto lawyer with no diplomatic background or foreign service experience, Bercovici had expressed strong support for Israel and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and was critical of Palestinian leadership and the United Nations – positions she expressed in her monthly Toronto Star columns on the Middle East.

The appointment was viewed in some circles as squaring with the Conservative government's well-established support for Israel.

Bercovici was in Toronto last month to help lay the groundwork for Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne's forthcoming economic mission to Israel. The ambassador also addressed members of the Empire Club on Canada's need to catch up with other countries in cashing in on Israel's high-tech revolution.

The CJN interviewed Bercovici by telephone. As requested by her and her staff, most of the questions were submitted in advance.

Canadian Ambassador to Israel Vivian Bercovici

Is the job what you expected it to be? Any bumps along the road?

Because of the nature of the way in which I was appointed, it wasn't a clear path. I didn't really have a lot of time to consider expectations, although when I was appointed, I had some. But no huge surprises. I'm accustomed to operating and functioning at a pretty high-stress environment where things change a lot and you really have to think on your feet. I've been a litigator. I've been a corporate lawyer, and you are always responding to changing circumstances and have to react fast. And that's what this job is all about. It's about using social skills, negotiating skills, assessing situations. You need to be a reasonably quick study and it's a highly complex environment. But it's the kind of environment I thrive on. There are always little things that surprise you, but nothing terribly shocking.

After your appointment, there were some who took you to task for being a little pro-Likud.

I'm not partisan. Never have been. People choose to read into things I've said or written. There has been a lot of absolute fiction attributed to me, and I have no idea where that comes from. I'm not pro-Likud. I'm there as a public servant to represent the government of Canada. In terms of any views I may have held prior to my appointment, I think people project onto me what they feel I should be or what they need me to be. Many of the things said about me bear no resemblance to reality.

> The Trudeau government continues to express very strong support for Israel, on a bilateral basis and in international forums.

If anyone reads the actual Toronto Star columns, they would be hard-pressed to find a consistent partisan view. Since that time, people have chosen to attribute certain views to me that I absolutely never expressed. I very consciously steered away from certain topics.

Given the previous government's popularity in Israel, its staunch support for Israel, has Canada's change in government registered in Israel, and if so, how?

Absolutely the change has registered. Canada is such an important country for Israel because of the long-standing support, so the election was watched very closely, as was the campaign. The government in Israel was very pleased with the previous government. They're very pleased with the current government. The Trudeau government continues to express very strong support for Israel, on a bilateral basis and in international forums.

Canada has been perceived in Israel stereotypically as a cold, empty place. Has that changed, and what does Israel expect of Canada?

There's much more awareness and knowledge in Israel of America than Canada. That's just the way it is, because there's such strong ties between America and Israel. As much as the Jewish community of Canada feels close to Israel, I think Israel feels a kinship with the community in Canada. But when it comes to Canada as a whole, they always ask questions about it: "It's big, it has beautiful nature… a big country with a lot of different times zones and climate regions." And too often Israelis are under the impression that most people in Canada speak French. But there's also not as much general knowledge, frankly, among Canadians about Israel.

Canada was involved in multilateral peace talks arising from the 1991 Madrid process. Is there an expectation in Israel that Canada should become involved again?

That would be utter speculation for me, and I'm not going to do it. The environment is very, very fluid right now, and I think Israeli leaders are focused on the November elections in America. Whether there's any formulated expectations with respect to a Canadian role would be absolutely conjecture on my part.

You mentioned in your address to the Empire Club that Canada is lagging in high-tech investments in and partnerships with Israel, and that "most other countries are way ahead of us." Why do you think this has happened and how can Canada fix it?

In Toronto and Ottawa, I talked to all kinds of people about how we need a bit of a boost, a kick-start to tech innovation and capabilities in Canada, particularly Ontario. Those are significant issues to be made by others. So I wouldn't want to jump ahead of them and be presumptuous. We're a big country and have tremendous assets and strengths that can be deployed for this sort of issue.

Do you have any advice for Premier Wynne in advance of her mission to Israel?

I would never presume to give advice to the premier, but what I would suggest is that she come, as I know she will, full of energy, an open mind and be prepared to be dazzled by the creativity, innovation in Israel, and to be inspired by it… and to be mindful of how we can adapt it to be successful in our environment.

Any thoughts on the recent appointment of Canadian law professor Michael Lynk as the UN's Special Rapporteur on human rights in Palestine?

I have nothing to add to what the minister of foreign affairs said.

There has been speculation (in Embassy magazine and iPolitics) that you will soon be replaced. Any comment?

I go and I do my job with gusto and every ounce of energy I have every day. ■

Mimouna and Jewish-Arab cultural symbiosis

Backstory

JIMMY BITTON

The history of Mimouna, the festival that traditionally marks the end of Passover for the Jews of Morocco, is unknown. It appears to have no clear basis in classic Jewish sources.

According to one theory, Mimouna marks the anniversary of the death of Maimon ben Joseph, the father of the pre-eminent medieval Sephardi philosopher, Torah scholar and physician, Moshe ben Maimon, otherwise knows as the Rambam. Others contest that Mimouna can be traced etymologically to "ma'amoun," the Arabic word for wealth and fortune. Some connect Mimouna to the Hebrew word "emuna," (faith in God). Meanwhile, the Rambam offered the explanation that the word Mimouna is an adaptation of the Hebrew declaration "ani ma'amin," a traditional expression of faith that God will send the Messiah to redeem us. According to this interpretation, the Arabic pronoun, in this case "ana" instead of "ani," follows the verb "ma'amin," to form the word Mimouna (or "ma'amin ana").

But regardless of the elusive origins of Mimouna, one thing which remains certain is that there is a dialectic which connects the Jews of Morocco to their Arab neighbours. Mimouna offers a window into a distant yet re-emerging cultural symbioses that once existed between Jews and Arabs in Morocco.

To be clear, at no point in history was Morocco an "interfaith utopia." The Jewish community of Morocco had a dizzying variety of contradictory experiences over time, ranging from violent persecution to full equality. Even so, the extent of Jewish integration into Moroccan society is an impressive achievement that speaks to the fact that Morocco historically viewed its Jews as an influential part of Moroccan identity and that its Jews have viewed their identity as very much Moroccan.

"There are no Jews in Morocco. There are only Moroccan subjects." This legendary statement, attributed to Mohammed V, king of Morocco from 1957 to 1961, became a synonym for coexistence between Jews and Arabs. Indeed, contemporary discourse concerning Jewish-Moroccan identity usually does not deviate from this rosy narrative. In a region plagued by intolerance and instability, Morocco was relatively more open and tolerant toward, Jews and Jews were openly proud to be part of Moroccan society.

In Morocco, Mimouna presented a time and space for both Jews and Arabs to celebrate the cultural links that united them. For a period extending over 700 years, the Iberian Peninsula saw fascinating intercultural contacts where Jews and Arabs interacted and interfused with each other to eventually mould a unique Judeo-Arabic culture.

By the end of the Reconquista (718-1492), Islamic rule over the peninsula came to an end and Jews (and Muslims) were eventually confronted by less hospitable Catholic rulers who sought religious uniformity. The infamous Alhambra Decree, issued on March 31, 1492, marked the beginning of the end of over 2,000 years of Jewish history in the peninsula. Jewish history, however, is much older in Morocco, where Jews constitute an ancient community who first arrived as early as 70 CE.

In Morocco, one of the destinations Jews fled to from Spain, this unique Judeo-Arabic culture was maintained, as was the use of the Spanish language. Moreover, Jews embraced the culture of their Moroccan hosts, developing a distinct Jewish Spanish-Moroccan culture. Arabic secular imagery, some of it pre-Islamic, found its way into Jewish liturgy, and, like most Jewish dishes formed in post-rabbinic times, Jewish-Moroccan cuisine reflects the intense cultural contact between Jews and the non-Jewish majority of Morocco.

At the annual Mimouna celebration, Jews opened their homes to both Jew and Arab alike, to socialize in an atmosphere of friendship and coexistence. Through food, costume, music and liturgy the two religions communities celebrated the cultural symbioses they had developed. This year, as we mark the end of Passover, let us all celebrate the rich and deeply synthesized tradition of Mimouna, and its message of coexistence and mutual respect. ■

The Enforceability of Prenups

CLE Seminar

Charles Wagner
Wagner Sidlofsky LLP
Chair, Trusts & Estates

Challenging a prenuptial agreement in the context of estate litigation happens more often than you think. When wealthy people marry, their lawyers often advise them to ensure that their fiancé signs a prenuptial agreement. The goal is to protect the wealthy person's family in case, God forbid, the marriage breaks up and/or the wealthy spouse dies. So, if the couple each hire good lawyers and the prenuptial contract clearly spells out their agreement, is that 'pre-nup' still open to challenge? Maybe. This is the issue being addressed at the June 21, 2016 continuing legal education program being run by B'nai Brith Canada's Estates & Trusts, Lawyers Division.

Since 2006, B'nai Brith Canada's Estates and Trusts Group has been providing seminars for lawyers and accountants on issues of interest. Our seminars have qualified for CPD hours. It will be a moot court format followed by a panel discussion, its facts drawn from a number of cases dealing with this sort of issue.

John Clegg
Scotia Private Client Group

In our fictional fact scenario the 65 year old widow Yenta Shmata marries the 41 year old bachelor Richard Shmere. At the insistence of Yenta's children Richard and Yenta sign a prenuptial agreement under which Richard waives any rights to a division of property or support if there is a divorce or if Yenta predeceases him. When Yenta dies Richard goes to court to set aside the prenuptial agreement and asks the court for a division of net family property and support.

Jordan Atin
Hull & Hull LLP

The seminar will highlight a number of legal issues including the relevance of full and frank disclosure, contracting out of the obligations of the Family Law Act, waivers of entitlement in support applications under the Succession Law Reform Act, and gifts mortis causa. The Judge of the moot court will be Jordan Atin of Hull & Hull LLP.

Debra Stephens
Goddard Gamage Stephens LLP

Ian Hull
Hull & Hull LLP

The role of Richard will be played by John Clegg who is an Estate and Trusts Professional at Scotia trust, Scotia Private Client Group. He will be examined in chief by Deb Stephens of Goddard Gamage and Stephens LLP and cross examined by Ian Hull of Hull & Hull LLP. This portion of the seminar has two of the premiere estate litigators in Toronto using a trial scenario to teach attendees about the role lawyers play in drafting domestic contracts, how prenuptial agreements may not preclude the surviving spouse from receiving support, and that a court has the discretion to order that an estate pay support even if the spouses signed an agreement waiving that right.

The event will take place on June 21st, 2016 at Shaarei Shomayim-Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8 and is open to lawyers and accountants. Please contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca.

An unexpected endorsement of the Bard, and a surprise best-seller

Merchant of Venice is one of his faves

As the world marks the 400th anniversary of William Shakespeare's death, Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, says he's also a fan of the Bard, and especially The Merchant of Venice, famous for its derogatory depiction of the Jewish moneylender Shylock. "I have read most of works by Shakespeare and enjoyed them," Khamenei tweeted April 25. "Shakespeare plays, such as the Merchant of Venice or Othello, are all in accordance with values, but western values," he said. Shylock is portrayed as scheming, vindictive and greedy. The literal pound of flesh he collects from borrower Antonio has come to mean ruthlessness in the English language.

The Bard has a fan in Tehran.

Developer seeks creditor protection

Urbancorp, a Canadian real estate developer with single-dwelling homes and townhouse projects throughout Toronto, filed a request for protection from creditors last week, less than five months after it raised 180 million shekels ($60 million) in Israel through the sale of bonds. The money raised was used to repay loans to Canadian lenders. Midroog, a credit rating agency that operates in Israel, announced it was ceasing to rate Urbancorp's debt after the company's three Israeli directors resigned along with its internal auditor, which led the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange to halt trading in its bonds. Globes reported in Israel. Meanwhile in Toronto, Tarion, an Ontario corporation that warranties new homes, issued a notice of proposal to revoke the registration of 17 Urbancorp-related companies. Urbancorp is appealing the decision.

Talmud is a hit in Italy

The first volume of a project to translate the Talmud into Italian is an unexpected best-seller, after a first print run of 2,000 copies sold out in three days and a second run of 3,000 also sold out. Publisher Shulim Volgelmann said the $57 (Cdn) volume was likely being purchased by non-Jews, reflecting a growing interest in Italy about Jewish culture. The 416-page book covers less than 10 per cent of the Talmud. Project Talmud began five years ago with the support of the Italian state, and more volumes are ready for publication. Italy has 30,000 Jews. ■

Letters to the Editor

Response to York's president

As community organizations dedicated to enhancing the quality of life for Jewish students on campus and advocating for the Jewish community, we read the interview with York University's president, Mamdouh Shoukri ("President says York University committed to inclusion," April 21), with great interest.

We were disappointed to see comments that we felt were condescending to the concerns of our community and dismissive of the concerns of our students. While we acknowledge his stated commitment to combat bigotry and enhance inclusion, his administration's failure to address the growing sense of alienation among Jewish students on campus has led many in our community to question whether York University's leadership is either incapable of, or unwilling to, uphold its own ideals.

We remain alarmed by the seeming disregard of York University's administration to recognize and confront anti-Semitism on campus.

He stated that the mural at York University contributed to his decision to establish an advisory committee on inclusion. We were astonished to learn that almost half of the members appointed to the inclusion committee either support boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) or have been publicly critical of Israel.

These appointments cannot possibly be reconciled with encouraging inclusion and will only serve to increase tension and further alienate Jewish students and faculty.

If Shoukri's desire and the policies of the administration are to build an inclusive and diverse campus that nurtures the respectful exchange of ideas, we call on him to make a change. Remove any members of the committee with a record of publicly promoting BDS and other anti-Israel initiatives and replace them with those experienced in bridging differences and strengthening harmony on campus.

The community organizations that have signed this letter represent the diverse Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area. Our collective goal is to ensure that the administration acts in a manner consistent with its stated goal of encouraging inclusion. Our desire has always been, and remains, to work with you and your administration to achieve this goal.

As he has stated, York University has a proud history in the community. By taking meaningful steps to address discrimination and intolerance on campus, York University has the opportunity to be a leader in North America in dealing with these difficult issues in an effective and equitable manner.

Matzah factory memories

Thank you for the wonderful article, "A matzah factory on Ontario Street," (April 21) and kudos to Bill Gladstone for unearthing this fascinating story about Canada's first matzah factory, back in 1908.

What I found very remarkable is that Montreal, with its much larger and more established Jewish community, did not have its own bakery at that time. Apparently the Toronto manufacturer was so eager to cater to the Montreal market that their product bore the kashrut certification of Rabbi Meldola de Sota of Montreal, rather than that of Toronto's leading rabbi at the time, Rabbi Yaakov Gordon.

The article does not say who owned the bakery or how long it was in existence. However I do remember there being a matzah bakery here in Toronto in the late 1930s when I was a youngster. I think it was owned by the Gula family, but I do not know whether it was the same one as on Ontario Street.

I don't think that this bakery was around after World War II, and I wonder why. Gladstone points out that there was a 25 per cent import duty on matzah. Would that not make local matzah very competitive with the older and more established New York bakeries such as Manischewitz and Streit's? Perhaps my contemporaries can provide more information about these bakeries and why they did not succeed.

RABBI·2·RABBI

The challenge of teaching the Shoah

We must honour survivors, mourn the victims and proudly proclaim "Never again," all while continuing to grow a living Judaism

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: The Holocaust and the founding of the State of Israel have been pillars of Jewish education for decades. We have taught our children that these two events are fundamental to their Jewish identities. But we are seeing less engagement with Israel in younger generations and an increasing distance from the experience of the Holocaust as well. I think we risk oversimplifying Judaism by restricting focus to these two aspects.

Emil Fackenheim wrote that the 614th commandment is to avoid giving Hitler a posthumous victory. But I don't think that the memory of the Holocaust in and of itself will motivate substantive Jewish choices. How can we make sure to hear the stories of the survivors and honour them, mourn the victims and proudly proclaim "Never again," all while continuing to grow a living Judaism?

Rabbi Korobkin: The last generation of survivors is gradually aging and passing on, and this has changed the entire paradigm of Holocaust studies. So it's not surprising that some of our youth might be less than enchanted with Holocaust studies. At the same time, new innovations are making the Shoah more relevant to today's youth. Projects like Facing History introduce the Holocaust through a contemporary lens of racism, prejudice and how evil stealthily and insidiously comes to prominence within society.

The dichotomy you present of choosing between remembering our past and moving forward with a living Judaism doesn't resonate with me. Not only is there no contradiction between the two, the very key to our future has always been through connecting with our past.

While Fackenheim may have overstated the role of the Holocaust in Jewish life, it is nonetheless a vital component. Not only do we honour the six million by remembering them, but we also provide more texture and context to the Judaism of today by connecting it to the world of European Jewry before the Shoah.

Rabbi Grushcow: I believe deeply in the importance of the past to the present, and forward into the future. But your believing it and my believing it does not necessarily make it resonate with others, especially those who are farther removed.

Rashi, in his famous comment on the first verse of Genesis, asks why the Torah begins with stories. Why not simply begin with the laws? Because, he says, the stories give a context for the laws.

The most effective Holocaust education puts stories in the foreground. I am thinking, for example, of the survivors who share their stories with our bnei mitzvah students at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, or how our confirmation class learns about individual lives for our Yom Hashoah service each year. It doesn't mean we ignore the bigger context, which is critical. It does mean that we search for the lens that helps our students relate.

At the same time, the Shoah is one chapter in a much longer history. I want our students to know about Rashi and Gluckl of Hamelin, Rabbi Yochanan Ben Zakkai and Beruriah, Shabtai Zvi and Regina Jonas. I want our students to know the stories of Sephardi communities as well as Ashkenazi ones, and about Jews from Africa and Asia as well as Europe. We need to keep telling the story of the Shoah. We need to acknowledge evil to keep it from happening again – and not only to us, but to anyone. And we need to make room for many stories, so every Jewish child can see themselves in our past, and see their way into our future.

Rabbi Korobkin: I agree that we can't sacrifice the pantheon of Jewish history for the Holocaust. But as a child of a survivor, my view may be biased. The Holocaust is unrivalled by any other event in Jewish history because of the sheer magnitude of genocide and devastation to whole communities and cultures.

Its uniqueness to our history – indeed, to world history – demands that we treat it uniquely and with greater emphasis. So I'm willing to tolerate the rolled eyes of some millennials if it means that we might get through to others.

The Shoah's impact, both on our past and our future, is too important to consign to yet another iteration of Jewish suffering. As we see the new anti-Semitism of the 21st century intensifying, we can't afford to do any less. ■

Fievel Mousekewitz's lessons about anti-Semitism

Thirty years ago, An American Tail hit the big screen. The animated movie/musical tells the story of Fievel Mousekewitz, a precocious rodent with an oversized newsboy cap who, along with his family, flees oppressive late-1800s Russia to seek freedom in the United States. Separated from his family during a treacherous sea voyage, Fievel is forced to navigate the New World on his own in the hope of reuniting with his father, mother and siblings.

An American Tail was the first time I can recall being exposed to the notion of anti-Semitism. The metaphor that underpins the film – the mice represent the Jewish People, the brutal cats are stand-ins for anti-Semites – is simple enough to parse, that long before I was old enough to begin to comprehend the history of anti-Semitism, let alone the Holocaust, An American Tail taught me there were people in the world who hated people like me because we were Jewish. (The late film critic Roger Ebert's primary criticism of An American Tail – that it "has such vague ethnic grounds… that only a few children will understand or care that the Mousekewitzes are Jewish" – belies my experience, and, I suspect, that of many more Jewish children of a certain era who were shown the film by our day school teachers.)

The central conceit of An American Tail is that "there are no cats in America." Fievel's father first voices the refrain in the wake of a pogrom that convinces him to leave Russia; it makes a second appearance in musical form later on, as the collected mice sing their way across the sea.

But Papa Mousekewitz's prophecy ultimately proves to be entirely false – there are indeed cats in America, and they harbour the same hatred as their Old World kin. Even as Fievel is reunited with his family at the end of An American Tail, the film's message is that there is no escaping anti-Semitism.

It's a lesson that resonates especially these days. In the United Kingdom last week, two Labour Party parliamentarians made news for their hateful rhetoric and inaccurate statements about Jews. It started when online comments by Naz Shah, a Labour member of Parliament, were unearthed. In 2014, she shared a Facebook post titled "Solution for Israel-Palestine Conflict – Relocate Israel into United States," which claimed that relocating Israel would end "foreign interference" in the Middle East, and leave "the whole world happy." Two days later, Ken Livingstone, the former mayor of London and a current Labour MP, was suspended after telling the BBC, "When Hitler won his election in 1932, his policy then was that Jews should be moved to Israel. He was supporting Zionism before he went mad and ended up killing six million Jews."

Meanwhile, back in America, Republican presidential hopeful Donald Trump was pushing his "America First" vision, repurposing a phrase (knowingly or unknowingly – with Trump you're never quite sure) popularized by the anti-Semite and Nazi-sympathizer Charles Lindbergh in the early years of World War II.

As Fievel Mousekewitz learned in An American Tale, even in the glorified utopia of the West the cats still chase the mice. Some things, it seems, never change. ■ — YONI

YOM HASHOAH

Srebrenica and the spectre of Auschwitz

Franklin Bialystok

I was in The Hague in December 2011 part of the Canadian delegation to the International Task Force on Holocaust Education, Research and Commemoration, since renamed The International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance. It was created in 2000, and Canada was admitted in 2007 and made a full member three years later.

I was invited to join the delegation by the multicultural branch of the Ministry of Immigration and was assigned to the Education Working Group. The task force met biannually and that year, the host was the Netherlands.

A few weeks before the meeting in The Hague, a notice was sent to the delegates (about 200 from approximately 30 countries) offering us a visit to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. The tribunal was held in a separate building across the plaza in the complex that housed our meetings. I was one of about a dozen task force members who signed up.

We were given a detailed briefing about the civil war in Yugoslavia, the creation of the tribunal, and the charges against Radovan Karadzic for crimes against humanity against Muslims in the former Yugoslav republic of Bosnia. Historically, Yugoslavia was a mixture of Muslims, Catholic Croats and Orthodox Serbs. They spoke the same language, and during the reign of Josip Broz Tito, from 1945 to 1980, lived in relative harmony. With the breakdown of the Yugoslav federation, the two main nationalities, Croats and Serbs, sought to divide Bosnia. But their mutual animosity and the acceleration of territorial demands by Serbia led to the creation of Republika Srpska, an autonomous Serbian state within Bosnia, with Karadzic as the self-appointed president in 1992.

Karadzic was born in 1945 and was an acclaimed poet in his youth. He attended the University of Sarajevo and the Columbia Medical School and studied neurotic disorders in Denmark before becoming a psychiatrist in Sarajevo. He spoke at least three languages fluently – Serbo-Croatian, English and German. His paramilitary began a program of "ethnic cleansing" – specifically the persecution, deportation, hostage taking and murder of the Bosnian Muslim population. Under his direction, the male population of Muslims, numbering more than 7,500 in Srebrenica, was systematically murdered and buried outside the town. When the regime fell in 1995, Karadzic was indicted by the tribunal. The Srebrenica action was declared to be a genocide. He avoided capture for 13 years by disguising himself and adopting an assumed name and identity. His trial began in 2010 and he chose to represent himself.

> As a child of survivors and a student and teacher of this history, I have never been able to grasp the incongruity in the human capacity to navigate between benevolence and evil.

After our briefing, we were taken to a gallery of the tribunal with one-way glass separating us from the proceedings. Karadzic, looking very much the urban European intellectual, with his well-known mane of white hair, was about 20 feet from our seats. A report on the Srebrenica massacre was being explained by an Australian forensic archeologist who had worked at the site. His account was factual, and its impact was graphic. Karadzic listened without translation and in his cross examination, speaking Serbo-Croatian, asked specific, pointed questions, seeking to poke fissures into the report. He was calm, incisive, unflappable.

I witnessed this grotesque spectacle, captivated and repelled. As a child of survivors and a student and teacher of this history, I have never been able to grasp the incongruity in the human capacity to navigate between benevolence and evil. Karadzic, a doctor who ministered to all Bosnians, orchestrated the first genocide in Europe since the Holocaust.

That night, I paced my room until dawn, boarded a train for Amsterdam, and flew home.

Karadzic had shaken my hope for humanity. In my naiveté, I had believed that Europe had learned a lesson in the Holocaust. But the disintegration of Yugoslavia, and the current breakdown of civility throughout the continent, is evidence that the spectre of Auschwitz has not been erased.

Karadzic, born as I was in the shadow of the Holocaust, was found guilty on all counts on March 16. He was sentenced to 40 years in prison. ■

Hate is never right, and love is never wrong

For many survivors, the lesson of the Holocaust is to rebuild, reconcile and live life in a way that belies the brutal experience of their youth

ELI RUBENSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For the last 30 years, I have been working closely with Holocaust survivors in Canada and around the world. In all that time, the one attribute found in an astonishing number of survivors that has impressed me most has been their ability to love – to rebuild, to reconcile, to carry on their lives in a fashion that belies the brutal experience of their youth.

Nowhere was this more evident than last year, when I attended the ceremony marking the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau. The most extraordinary moment for me was when Roman Kent, a survivor of Auschwitz, spoke about his experience. When asked how much time he has spent in the camp, he said, "My answer is I do not know. What I do know is that a minute in Auschwitz was like an entire day, a day was like a year, and a month an eternity."

He went on to say that "it is our mutual obligation, that of survivors and national leaders, to instil in the current and future generations the understanding of what happens when virulent prejudice and hatred are allowed to flourish. We must all teach our children tolerance and understanding at home and in school. For tolerance cannot be assumed... it must be taught. And we must make it clear that hate is never right and love is never wrong."

After everything he'd gone through, his answer was still that "hate is never right and love is never wrong."

My mind drifted back to a time, approximately 15 years ago, when I was in a Jerusalem hotel on Yom Hazikaron, the day when Israel marks the loss of its soldiers. I was with Max Eisen, a survivor who lost over 50 members of his family in the Holocaust. At 11 o'clock in the morning, a siren sounded throughout the country, and its citizens stopped whatever they were doing to stand in honour of the people who sacrificed their lives to defend Israel. Pedestrians crossing the street, cars in the downtown core of Jerusalem, children on a basketball court – all paused mid-activity in a moment of sombre solidarity with the victims of Israel's many conflicts.

Max and I were the last two guests still lingering in the hotel dining room that day. The only people with us were the mostly Arab staff – the waiters and those who were cleaning up after breakfast. We were so engaged in our conversation – Max has a miraculous story of survival – that we lost track of time. When the siren sounded, we rose immediately and stood. The Arab waiters, meanwhile, continued to work.

Of course, it's not hard to understand why. The Arab-Israeli conflict has dragged on for the better part of a century. It's not a given to expect members of the Arab population to stand up and honour Israel's fallen soldiers, given the hostility and the difficult relationship that still exists between Arabs and Jews in Israel.

But even looking at the situation from that perspective, one of the waiters went further than mere abstinence. In fact, he crossed a line. During the minute of silence, he aggressively lifted up his hand and made an obscene gesture recognizable to anyone, an act of open hostility in this moment of solemnity – a defiant anti-salute to what was being marked at that point in time.

I wasn't sure if Max had seen the gesture, and we continued with our conversation until we returned to our rooms. A little while later, I called Max in his room and asked if he had seen what the waiter had done. He had indeed noticed the same obscene gesture, and I could tell that he was shaken by it. So I immediately called the hotel manager, who arranged to meet me downstairs in the dining room. (He also sent a fruit basket and box of chocolate to Max's room.)

I arrived in the dining room, not sure what to expect.

To my shock, I found the manager standing in the middle of the room with all the waiters, mostly young men, lined up. He asked me to point out the one who had made the defiant gesture.

It was a difficult moment. I was not sure I would be able to recognize him and, if I did, what the consequence for this individual might be. If I identified him, he would probably get fired. Would it solve anything if this person, who obviously had strong feelings, reasons that I could never know, lost his job? Or would it further exacerbate the situation? What was the correct response?

In that moment, I had no idea.

Buying time, I said, "Let me take a closer look." I scanned the 15 waiters and my eyes fell on the one I felt fairly sure was the culprit.

I paused for a moment, and our eyes locked. He knew he was the one I suspected.

The lonely survivor

Avrum Rosensweig

He braces himself against the stacks of old papers and food packaging scattered throughout his diminutive apartment at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue in Toronto.

His is a challenging life. It is a sad life.

He is a survivor of the Holocaust, and nobody comes to visit him except a social worker from time to time, or those young religious girls who listen to his memories of Auschwitz. He thinks they think he is simple and has little depth, but they are wrong. Or perhaps he is, and they don't think that at all.

The days are long and the nights are quiet. His shelves are stocked with tinned spaghetti and rice crackers, but he's thankful to the National Council of Jewish Women for a box of Passover food brought to his home. His Passover seder was traditional, but only the spirit of the prophet Elijah walked through his door, and he (the prophet) was in a rush.

One day, many years ago, the once debonair man wrote a letter to all the Jewish leaders he could think of. The letter was written on a special cotton stock with his name embossed in gold ink along the centre-top. He begged them to recognize the plight of many Holocaust survivors in Toronto, Israel and elsewhere, who live below the poverty line and experience the worst lifestyle possible after the Shoah – loneliness.

Cordial responses arrived from rabbis and executive directors expressing their concern. One even asked him to speak at a conference addressing survivor poverty and isolation. He accepted, but the conference never happened. It was cancelled because there were "other pressing priorities." He had already written his speech.

The next morning, after receiving that letter, he tossed his speech into the garbage. All afternoon he stared at the crumpled piece of paper. As he did, he remembered his late wife, Minnie. Her image comforted him and made him sob. Mengele, "the bastard," had experimented on this beautiful young woman and ensured that children and grandchildren would never be part of their lives.

> One of the greatest injustices in our society today is to let an elderly survivor be alone.

And as the light of the day dimmed and Yom Hashoah ended, he continued to wonder how it was at all possible that any survivors could be by themselves. He thought about the hundreds of songs, plays and reports about the plight of survivors of the Holocaust and how many had been abandoned to a life of solitude.

In his mind, he just couldn't understand how it could be that not a knock came on his door and the telephone stayed quiet. He didn't need the old dial phone anymore so, as the darkness fell, he pulled it from the wall and placed it on top of the stack of newspapers. It sat there like a silent relic never to be plugged in again.

The lonely survivor died in the winter. The good people at Steeles Memorial Chapel called around for a minyan to say Kaddish for him. The final amen was a shame.

On Yom Hashoah, commit to discovering who our survivor population is at home and in Israel and how you can visit. One of the greatest injustices in our society today is to let an elderly survivor be alone! It is our responsibility to rectify this sin and to ask the lonely survivors to forgive us for not being more vigilant, as we said we would.

According to the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Survivors (September 2015), Israel is home to 189,000 Holocaust survivors, 25 per cent living below the poverty line. Their average age is 84. About a third of them live alone. ■

The two stories that emerged from the Holocaust

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

What do we commemorate on Yom Hashoah?

We remember the most horrific event in history. In a macabre mix of cruelty and efficiency, six million Jews were murdered in just six years. In events that still defy belief, a leading western nation put its strategic self-interest aside to pursue genocide, and an army of well-educated men plotted the murders of 1.5 million children. In the end, nearly two-thirds of Europe's Jews were murdered.

It's impossible to ignore the Holocaust, and as a consequence, it's easy to misinterpret the Holocaust. The memory of the six million has been misused by small-minded preachers and petty politicians, and even by idealists who desperately search for good everywhere. Lawrence Langer, in his book Preempting the Holocaust, critiques those who find "positive lessons" in the Holocaust. He cites an incident at Matthausen, when a group of Jews were thrown into a pit of quicklime, and shouted for hours as they died an agonizing, slow death. Langer concludes: "Nothing we hear from well-intentioned commentators about… the light of human community emerging from Holocaust darkness… or 'fellowship of the suffering and the long suffering'… can silence the cries of those hundreds of Jews being boiled to death in an acid bath."

Langer is correct. The six years of the Holocaust are an enormous black hole of barbarity, an inexplicable horror that one can mourn, and only mourn.

And yet that is not all. There are two perspectives in history. An event can be viewed both on its own and as part of a larger narrative.

So what would be the larger narrative of the last 77 years? In terms of world history, little has changed. Over and over, political leaders have vowed "never again," but that promise has proved false. Since 1945, there have been genocides in Cambodia, Rwanda, Bosnia and Darfur. Even Samantha Power, who writes eloquently about ending genocide, serves an administration that did nothing for the civilians of Syria. In the last 71 years, the world has not changed very much.

But in terms of Jewish history, things have changed dramatically. The Holocaust was the culmination of two millennia of anti-Semitism and should have broken our spirits. Survivors should have given up hope, and world Jewry should have collapsed.

Yet nothing of the sort occurred. In the shadows of the concentration camps, orphaned survivors got married and started new families. The brichah sent ten of thousands of survivors to Israel, where many went directly to fight for the new state. And survivors around the world built communities and garnered remarkable accomplishments in business, scientific and political life, including several Nobel Prizes.

Alongside the survivors, the Jewish world re-energized itself. After 1,900 years of exile, Jews returned to their homeland and built a state that is a world leader in multiple areas. The arc of Jewish history since the Shoah has been nothing short of miraculous, with a people rising from the ashes in a manner no one could have predicted.

On Yom Hashoah, we need to keep two stories in mind. Our first responsibility is to reflect on six years of carnage and mourn the six million. But at the same time, we must be inspired by the remarkable story of the past 71 years.

Last year, I accompanied the March of the Living to Birkenau and spent a dismal Yom Hashoah in that awful site of mass murder. But then I caught a glimpse of two teenagers standing by the barbed wire with Israeli flags draped over their shoulders. I was profoundly moved, because it reminded me that Jewish history did not end in 1945. We now have the State of Israel, and we have proud young Jews who will carry the legacy of the six million. And even though it was Yom Hashoah, I couldn't help but think, "Am Yisrael Chai." ■

The imperative for us to commemorate

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Natan Sznaider was born more than six decades ago in a displaced persons' camp in Germany to Holocaust survivor parents. When he was 20, he moved to Israel and is today a professor at the Tel Aviv-Yafo Academic College, where he teaches contemporary thought. I heard him recently make an important distinction between Holocaust survivors and Holocaust refugees. The former lived under the Nazis, the latter were displaced because of Hitler but had escaped Nazi rule.

My wife is a survivor of the Lodz ghetto and the Ravensbruck concentration camp. Part of her story can be seen in Every face has a name, to be shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival later this month. I'm a refugee who spent the years of World War II in various parts of the Soviet Union that weren't under Nazi occupation.

What survivors and refugees often have in common is that they're alive not because they were wise but because they were fortunate. I never tire of reminding myself and others that my parents and I survived because they acted irrationally, nay irresponsibly.

In 1940, when the Soviets asked them if they wanted to stay in Soviet-occupied Ukraine or return to their homes in Poland under Nazi rule, my parents, and thousands of others, opted for the latter. The Soviets, therefore, assumed we were a fifth column and exiled us to Siberia. The Germans never got there and we survived. Had my parents been prudent, we would have stayed and perished in the Holocaust.

The reason for their decision was a misguided faith in German culture and a pathological fear of Soviet Communism. To this day, it seems that many survivors and refugees are more comfortable with the political right than with the left. They lap up the writings of radical right-wing pundits – several of them Jewish – and eerie declarations by reactionary politicians.

They may profess commitment to Jewish values and the progressive teachings of the biblical prophets, but they seem to lose their sense of judgment when it comes to contemporary exponents of anti-liberal ideas.

For all my disdain for communism, I'm alive because of Communist USSR. My grandparents, aunts and uncles perished with their children in German-occupied Poland.

Growing up during World War II and its aftermath, I imbibed the tales of survivors and refugees. With time, I realized that what I heard may not have always reflected what actually happened. I now also know that what I myself remember from that time may not always tally with the facts.

Over the years, particularly around Holocaust Education Week in Toronto, I heard many lectures about different aspects of the Holocaust. Almost invariably, survivors and refugees insisted that only they knew what actually happened and that the academics and experts got it wrong.

Soon the world will only know what the academics teach, because every year the number of survivors and refugees diminishes. The world may then know more facts, but it'll miss the emotional impact of testimonies. While the stories, whether or not factually correct, made an impact on audiences, the historic accounts are more likely to leave them cold. They'll read about them in the way we read about the expulsion of the Jews from Spain more than 500 years ago or the pogrom in Kishinev at the beginning of the last century.

Which is an added reason why we should commemorate Yom Hashoah the way we mark many Jewish sacred occasions, including the tragic ones. What historians won't be able to give us and survivors and refugees won't be there to testify to, liturgy must provide. It must impress upon future generations that what happened to the Jewish People between 1933 and 1945 has changed Judaism for all time and imposed on us the imperative – in the words of the Toronto Jewish philosopher the late Emil Fackenheim – to survive in order not to give Hitler his posthumous victory. ■

Mein Bubbie

Sheryl Saperia

As the last generation to have known Holocaust survivors personally, it falls on us to tell their stories.

Today I bear witness to one woman: Perela Weintraub Pila, my late grandmother, mein bubbie.

Perela was the youngest of eight children from a traditional Jewish family in a Polish shtetl. As the war came to her village, the Jews were rounded up in the market square. "Do not come with us," were her mother's last life-saving words to her. "Go out into the world." She never saw her family again.

By then, she had already met my grandfather, Zalman. They wished to marry but felt it was unwise to do so during the war. After separating from her family, Perela tried to flee together with Zalman, but the Nazis caught up with them. Zalman was sent to Auschwitz. Perela was deported first to Graben and then to Bergen-Belsen, where hunger, cold and terror remained constant companions.

Perela contracted typhus on the death march and was transferred to a hospital after liberation. After months in and out of consciousness, she emerged from her bed and was returned to a now-liberated Bergen-Belsen. Here, she was reunited with a friend of her parents, who uttered these auspicious words: "Your fiancé is alive."

Perela and Zalman married in October 1945. Both were the sole survivors of their large families. My grandmother recalled that her hair was still wet from the mikvah when she and Zalman took their wedding vows.

They came to Canada penniless and unable to speak English. They worked day and night to make a good life for their children and grandchildren. There was no narrative of victimization. The lessons and values they taught were exceptionally positive.

Here are a few simple pearls from the woman called Perela.

On transforming suffering to compassion: Both my grandparents took their suffering and transformed it into hard work and kindness. They knew pain in a way that few ever do and were determined to relieve it in others. Perela was force-fed hatred and inhumanity but nurtured others with love and compassion. She delivered food right to the doorsteps of those in need, visited the sick and provided financial assistance to any person or organization that asked. She always had a smile on her face.

> Perela was force-fed hatred and inhumanity but nurtured others with love and compassion.

On optimism: "Maybe today is not a good day. Tomorrow will be better."

On anger and parenting: Parents must keep anger away from their kids. If a child is being difficult, bring that child closer.

On motherhood: "You are a mother and now you are going to suffer."

On faith: Perela unequivocally ascribed her survival to God and the signs He gave her during those dark years. She was certain that God spared her for the purpose of doing good in the world.

On marriage: My grandparents' marriage served as a model to our family. They made their decisions together as though they were a single person, and never raised their voices to one another. Her advice to my mother before getting married was to greet your husband with a smile on your face, and be sure to put on some lipstick before he gets home.

On judging others: "If you really want to know someone, you can't enter the house through the front door. Peek through the back instead." It was her version of not judging a book by its cover.

This was my grandmother, unknowingly the bane of the radical Islamist world, which accuses her and her ilk of being agents of the great Jewish lie of the Holocaust. She epitomized the ability to instil love into life despite her own unspeakable history. She was living proof of the fallibility of the Islamist promise of victory over the weak and despicable "lovers of life."

Her memory will remain a testament to the truth of an ancient rabbinic dictum that a little light can vanquish great darkness. ■

Rights complaint filed over delivery of 'hate propaganda'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Canada Post and the government of Canada have been named in a complaint under the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) for distributing a monthly Toronto tabloid newspaper that is allegedly laced with hate propaganda.

Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman, who has a track record of successful actions before human rights commissions, claims in a four-page complaint that Your Ward News is "misogynist, racist, anti-Jewish, anti-Muslim and homophobic hate propaganda."

"The government of Canada has the legal obligation to stop the dissemination of hate propaganda, not profit from its distribution through Canada Post."

Warman goes on to assert that by continuing to distribute Your Ward News, the government and post office are not only in violation of the CHRA, but also international legal obligations that prohibit the dissemination of hate propaganda.

"By knowingly distributing hate propaganda and profiting from it, [Canada Post and the government of Canada] have engaged in discriminatory conduct," Warman asserts.

Late last week, Judy Foote, the minister of public services and procurement, issued a statement saying, "I have reviewed some of the material published in the tabloid Your Ward News, and find it highly offensive and well outside the norm of Canadian values. Many residents of the Greater Toronto Area have raised significant objections with the distribution of the tabloid in their region by Canada Post. As minister responsible for Canada Post, I have asked its board of directors to review and consider appropriate measures within their authority to address the distribution of this material."

James Sears, editor-in-chief of Your Ward News, replied to The CJN's request for comment with a series of extracts from the paper's most recent edition.

He rejected allegations the paper is anti-Semitic or homophobic: "These are slogans spewed out by ZioMarxists to attack the purveyors of the truth. If you criticize Israel for murdering Palestinians or if you disagree with the Hollywood narrative of the 'Jewish Holocaust,' then 'Social Justice Warriors' call you an 'anti-Semite.'"

Sears said he'd fight any move to prevent delivery. "We have made it clear to Canada Post that if they interfere in any way with the delivery of our paper, we will sue them for access to apartment buildings," he said.

Your Ward News has been a lightning rod for controversy ever since its first copy was delivered by Canada Post in March 2015. At the time, a Jewish postal worker objected to delivering what he called hate propaganda.

The paper proclaims itself "the world's largest anti-Marxist publication" and a "Christian Libertarian National Socialist gospel." The spring 2016 issue features a Liberal party banner under a menorah, Photoshopped pictures of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne, and Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, wearing a tallit and tfillin and handing Ontario MPP Arthur Potts, dressed as a Roman centurion, 30 pieces of silver.

In 2015, Your Ward News claimed it was delivered to 48,000 homes and was read by 300,000 people. Its website states it's delivered by mail to 300,000 homes and businesses in an area bounded by Highway 401 to the north, Lake Ontario to the south, Victoria Park in the east and Lansdowne Avenue to the west. It boasts more than one million readers.

The website lists its publisher/owner as Leroy St. Germaine, and it claims to be "Metis-owned and operated since 2007."

Warman's complaint refers specifically to its four most recent issues, dating to last December. In only its most recent edition, the spring 2016 issue, Warman alleges the paper advocates Nazism, refers to opponents as "faggy," described someone as a "boy-hungry faggot," engages in Holocaust denial and anti-Jewish bigotry and mocks sexual assault victims.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers welcomed Warman's complaint as did an anti-racist coalition that includes political consultant Warren Kinsella, and Farber.

The Toronto Police hate crimes unit opened an investigation into the paper in March 2015, after complaints it violated Criminal Code provisions against publishing hate literature. No charges were laid.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), along with Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, initiated the 2015 police complaint. CIJA's chief executive Shimon Fogel said police never explained why they declined to lay charges.

As to whether they should renew their investigation, Fogel said, "In any given issue of Your Ward News, there are sufficient reasons to warrant the laying of charges. Some issues are more egregious than others, but the publication is inherently offensive and replete with various examples of hate speech, whether directed against Jews or others."

Farber believes there are sufficient grounds for prosecution. "If the hate laws were written for anything, they were written for this kind of garbage," he said.

Referring to the cover of the current edition, Farber said the Photoshopped image of him handing Potts 30 pieces of silver "is classical anti-Semitism – a Jew paying off a politician to do his will."

Warman told The CJN he chose to target Canada Post and the federal government because both are subject to the CHRA and both are "morally and legally wrong" for distributing the material.

A spokesperson for Canada Post, said, "We take this matter seriously. We will consider the contents once we have had a chance to review the formal complaint." ■

Anti-Semitism rally draws passionate crowd to city hall

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The wet weather did not dampen the passion of the 100 people who turned out for a community rally against anti-Semitism on Sunday afternoon at Nathan Phillips Square.

The people in attendance included Christian and Jews, and represented all age groups. Many participants carried signs and placards, while others draped themselves in Canadian or Israeli flags.

The rally was hosted by Aedan O'Connor, vice-president of programming for Students Supporting Israel (SSI) at Ryerson University, and Robert Walker, Canadian director of Hasbara Fellowships Canada.

The roster of speakers included university students who talked about anti-Semitic activity on local campuses, advocacy leaders such as Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, and Lisa Cohen, executive director of the Centre for Jewish Culture and Education (CJCE), as well as Jewish community activist Vivienne Ziner and First Nations activist Ryan Bellerose.

O'Connor, a second-year biomedical sciences student at Ryerson, said there is anti-Israel activity at Ryerson, but the situation is much worse at other universities. She said a lecture at the University of Toronto on April 29 by Kenneth O'Keefe, an U.S.-born pro-Palestinian activist, spurred her to organize the May 1 rally.

What was most disturbing, she said was to see the hundreds of business people attending the lecture who "cheered O'Keefe's blatantly anti-Semitic" remarks, adding that she was outraged tax dollars paid for the facility where he spoke.

Another student who addressed the rally was Aidan Fishman, a first-year U of T law student. He acknowledged that a university, which values free speech, couldn't prevent O'Keefe from speaking there.

But he said he was particularly disturbed that U of T's Graduate Student Union, which is funded by a levy on all graduate students, paid speaker Amanda Lickers, who he said gave a "racist diatribe" against Jews in February.

He said she was supposed to talk about Israel, but all she did was attack Ashkenazi Jews, whom she likened to Nazis. "She called Ashkenazim 'Ashken-Nazis'... she said Jews were inherently racist colonials and parasites."

University, said she feels victimized and marginalized by anti-Semitism at York. She asked rhetorically how is it that all York students can study in a safe environment except Jewish students?

Cohen of the CJCE told stories of anti-Semitism from academics at McMaster University. She said when she took a course on peace and wrote a paper in support of Israel, she was given a failing grade. She said the mark was changed by the university administration when she agreed to drop the course.

Benolo told the gathering that anti-Semitism is rampant worldwide. "Over 1 billion people on the planet dislike Jews. We are such an insignificant number, and Israel is just a sliver of land, yet Israel is the heart of the world."

Nevertheless, he said he's encouraged by the many non-Jews who support Israel and the Jewish People. "We are supported by friends and allies – people who are standing with us. That warms my heart."

Bellerose, a strong supporter of the Jewish community, said First Nations have a lot to learn about survival from the Jewish People. But he said Jews must be more active in fighting anti-Semitism. "One of the biggest problems is that Jews are too apologetic. 'They say, the other guy [Palestinians] has a good story, too.'"

In a rousing speech, Ziner warned against the tendency for complacency among Jews, and especially indifference to flagrant anti-Semitism on campuses. "Anti-Zionism is inherently anti-Semitism," she said.

She accused the left of perverting the meaning of Zionism. "The left is making anti-Semitism palatable to the public."

Former York student Willem Hart, echoed Ziner's call to action. "I look around and I see all the same faces. Tell your kids to get involved." ■

Thornhill residents decry plan for tower on plaza site

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Thornhill residents who rely on the Jewish community stores in the kosher Sobeys plaza at Clark and Hilda avenues are fighting an uphill battle against a developer that wants to build a 20-storey residential building on the east side of the site.

Pamela Levy-Taraday, president of the SpringFarm Ratepayers Association (SFRA), a volunteer community advocacy group, spoke to The CJN about the plan that has the neighbouring Jewish community angry and worried that the proposed changes will negatively impact them.

Last November, RioCan – a commercial developer that owns what's officially called the Spring Farm Marketplace, which is home to a kosher Sobeys, a kosher Second Cup, Israel's Judaica and other Jewish-themed stores – held a meeting that attracted about 400 people.

At the gathering, Thornhill residents learned about a plan to demolish the stores on the east side of the plaza to make way for an 18-storey building. The proposal has since been amended to add two more storeys to allow for stores on a lower-level platform.

Ratepayers association says developers would be violating Vaughan's official plan.

"It's going to change the traffic patterns. They are going to change the exits... They want to close the Hilda Avenue entrance. The want to have the only real vehicle entrance and exit to the above-ground parking to come from Clark, which [as] we all know, it's pretty hard to get into the plaza from Clark anyway," Levy-Taraday said.

In the months since RioCan presented its plan to the community, the SFRA has conducted a community survey, held meetings to appeal to RioCan to amend its proposal, and drafted a petition to the City of Vaughan to halt the development.

The petition (http://bit.ly/SFRA_Petition_Sobeys_Plaza_Redevelopment) states that the proposal violates Vaughan's official plan and contravenes zoning bylaws for usage, density and height.

Vaughan councillor Alan Shefman, who represents Ward 5, where the plaza is located, said he has "very, very strong reservations" about RioCan's proposal.

"They'll need lots [of exemptions]... The reality is that it is not respectful of the city's official plan," Shefman said.

"I'm very strongly opposed to what they are doing here, and I don't think it's appropriate. I think their behaviour has been disrespectful."

Shefman said RioCan has been doing nothing more than pay lip service to concerned residents.

In February, RioCan agreed to host a charrette, a meeting that attempts to resolve conflicts between residents and developers.

About an hour into the meeting, which was attended by SFRA committee members and city staff, Shefman was informed that RioCan had already submitted its proposal to the city earlier that day, prior to the consultative gathering.

"To me, that was shocking... it was appalling behavior, and I have rarely seen that with a development company," Shefman said.

He said he is concerned about the impact the development will have on the Jewish community in the area if it is approved.

"It's not like any other neighbourhood plaza in the City of Vaughan... RioCan has failed to recognize the uniqueness of the character of that plaza... These guys don't care. They just don't care."

Sobeys, the kosher grocery store that sits on the west end of the plaza, has a lease that runs until 2030 and is currently undergoing renovations.

Sobeys Ontario spokesperson Vicki Leung said the company has been assured by RioCan that the development will not negatively affect them.

"Our investment is for the long term, so we have a vested interest in the Spring Farm Marketplace plaza to ensure that we can provide the most exceptional shopping experiences to our customers," Leung said.

Attempts to reach members of RioCan's planning and development team were unsuccessful.

The public hearing to address this proposal is scheduled for May 31. ■

Jewish Heritage Month

Survivors' belongings educate UQAM museum students

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

While she was an inmate of Lippstadt, a slave labour camp in Germany during World War II, a young Hungarian Jewish woman clandestinely created a cookbook, collecting favourite recipes from her fellow prisoners.

Found out, it would probably have cost her her life. But she persisted, secreting old receipts from the factory she worked in to use as pages, as well as string to bind them.

In all, she collected about 200 recipes, which she carefully wrote by hand. Thinking about these delicious dishes probably helped her get through her 12-hour workdays, when she subsisted on 1,000 calories a day.

She buried the book and dug it up after liberation. It's the only "souvenir" of the Holocaust that she kept and brought with her when she immigrated to Montreal.

Edith Gluck's cookbook is one of the many personal artifacts that Montreal survivors or their descendants have donated to the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) for display in its museum and for research.

For Gluck's daughter, Shirley Rosenfeld, these yellowed, fragile pages represent her mother's courage and the importance she placed on keeping her heritage alive under dire circumstances.

This story is told in a short video produced by Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) museum studies students, one of four so far made and disseminated on YouTube under the pilot project "Objects of Memory." They are graduate students enrolled in a new master's seminar called "Muséaliser les patrimoines sensibles," which teaches how to curate sensitive or difficult histories.

The students, paired with mentors from the MHMC and professional filmmakers, delved into the museum's artifacts and oral history collections. They did further research in local and international databases and archives, and interacted directly with the objects' former owners.

Then they made documentaries of 2-1/2 to 4 minutes in length, combining archival imagery with original interviews with the donors.

The students were guided by videographer Luc Cyr, who made the 2010 feature documentary The Heart of Auschwitz, about the cloth, heart-shaped autograph book made by a woman in Auschwitz, which has become an icon of the MHMC's permanent exhibition.

The partnership between the MHMC and UQAM is a natural one. The director of the graduate museology program, Jennifer Carter, is chair of the MHMC's museum committee.

The three other videos focus on a prayer shawl, a prisoner's uniform jacket, and the "people's radio" the Nazis distributed free of charge to spread their propaganda.

The tallit was donated by Ann Cohen, granddaughter of Harry Cohen, who immigrated to Montreal from Poland in the 1920s. Already established here with a family (including Ann's father), Cohen returned to his native land in June 1939 to see how relatives were faring as the Nazi menace grew.

After the Germans invaded Poland in September, he went into hiding with a Christian woman, but was caught and deported. He was never heard from again.

All his family received was a few traveller's cheques and the tallit.

The Romanian-born Louis Miller was 19 when he was deported to Auschwitz in 1944. The striped top of his uniform is the only thing he kept from that time – a symbol of his will to survive – and he brought it with him to Canada in 1948. After he died in 2009, his wife, Cecile, gave it to the MHMC.

The video about the radio includes archival footage of Joseph Goebbels' speeches, with French and English subtitles. A 1938 model of the radio is housed at the MHMC.

In addition to providing training to a new generation of museum professionals who previously had little knowledge of the Holocaust, and educating the public via social media, the MHMC hopes the project will encourage other donations of objects related to the Holocaust or Jewish prewar life.

The goal is not solely conservation of evidence. The MHMC has found that the belongings of survivors who live or have lived in Montreal have a powerful impact on visitors. ■

Carleton project plans to record oral histories

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

Carleton University's Centre for Holocaust Education and Scholarship (CHES), which was established last November, is set to begin recording the stories of local Holocaust survivors for a new and innovative teaching tool.

"Since the 1990s, survivors have been invited to do presentations in schools and their stories have become an integral part of teaching Holocaust history," said Mina Cohn, director of CHES.

"If we can create something short, that teachers can use in the classroom... they will be able to hear the voices of the actual survivors telling their own stories, even after they are gone."

Cohn said the idea for the project evolved over a period of years, as it became apparent that there would soon be nobody left with first-hand knowledge of what had happened during the Shoah.

"At first, we decided to train the 'second generation' to take over, but then we realized that most of them did not know the stories," she said. "We had a representative from Yad Vashem in Jerusalem meet with our second generation group so that we could learn from them what is being done."

> If we can create something short, that teachers can use in the classroom... [students] will be able to hear the voices of the actual survivors

CHES was established with the plan to record the stories of those Ottawa survivors who are still alive, in particular for use in schools and universities. Carleton's Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies, which houses CHES, is collaborating in this project, which will allow future generations of students, researchers, teachers and others to hear and see the people who experienced and witnessed the horrors of the Holocaust.

Mina Cohn

The CHES committee consists of 12 people, some of whom are children of survivors, who are utilizing their various skills for the project. Some are contacting and recruiting survivors, others will prepare them for the interviews, and some will work with the videographers.

"We will record as many as possible, as our budget permits," Cohn said.

Unfortunately, unlike other major centres in Canada, Ottawa does not have a Holocaust centre or funding for such a project.

"The money we have now came mostly from our committee members," said Cohn.

Having already identified 30 survivors living in the Ottawa area, the plan is to begin by recording 10 of them. For that to happen, Cohn estimates CHES will need $7,500 to cover production and editing costs.

Carleton University's FutureFunder has embraced the project and featured it on a dedicated fundraising page. There is a promotional video on the site and tax receipts will be issued for donations to the fund.

The page is time-limited and the number of days it will remain open is clearly noted online. ■

Ottawa high schoolers hear Romanian survivor's story

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

Nearly 1,300 high school students, from 15 schools in the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board were bused to Algonquin College last month to hear the personal story of Romanian Holocaust survivor Felicia Carmelly.

For the second year, the Jewish Federation of Ottawa collaborated with the Azrieli Foundation to bring a survivor's story to local youths who may otherwise never have an opportunity to learn first-hand the horrors of the Holocaust.

The Azrieli Foundation's Memoirs Program publishes memoirs of Holocaust survivors as a way of teaching these lessons to the broader community.

The students who heard Carmelly speak on April 12 and 13 were each given a copy of her memoir, published by the foundation.

"My claim to fame is basically that I survived the darkest time in history, which is the Holocaust," said Carmelly who was a young girl of 10 years old when her war story began.

She set the scene for her family's struggles with the aid of a map, showing the geographic area from which they were deported – the small, resort town of Dorn in Romania – and the route they travelled once they were deported.

From left, Debbie Halton-Weiss, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's Shoah committee, Elin Beaumont of the Azrieli Foundation and Felicia Carmelly

Carmelly's family (the Steigmans) lived a life of comfort in the resort town, in one of the only homes to have hot and cold running water. They enjoyed "cordial relationships" with their Romanian neighbours and did not anticipate the troubles that lay ahead for them.

"In 1940, when it became known that Poland was already occupied and atrocities had started...we couldn't believe what was happening," she said. "We thought it could not happen to us, because Romanians were different. Afterward, we found out that Jews in other countries had thought the same thing."

Eventually, the Jews of Dorn were deported, sent on trains and barges where many died along the way.

Carmelly and her parents found refuge in a small shack owned by a Jewish family. Eighteen refugees took shelter in a space that had previously housed only five. Their plan to stay only a few days stretched into 3-1/2 years, until they were eventually liberated by the Russians.

"In the spring of 1944, we left and arrived in May 1945 back to our home. Because our home had hot and cold running water it had been a German hospital, then a Soviet hospital, then a fire station. They allowed us to occupy one room in our own home," she said.

Although Carmelly and her parents survived the war, 34 members of their family perished.

After the war, her family spent a few years in Romania, then immigrated to Israel and eventually settled in Canada.

Along the way, Carmelly – who chose that surname while visiting Mount Carmel in Israel – taught herself English and earned a master's of social work and eventually a doctorate.

"On behalf of those who can no longer speak, I will end by saying that it is not what we stand for, but what we stand up for," Carmelly said to the students.

"If people like me can survive and get an education and get a profession, so can you." ■

Lecture series to look at Nuremberg chief prosecutor

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Now in its 11th year, the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture Series – scheduled this year for May 16 – has brought to Winnipeg such notable scholars as Martin Gilbert and Deborah Lipstadt and journalists such as Caroline Glick and Avi Shavit.

This year's presenter may not be quite as well known – outside legal circles, anyway – but nonetheless he has a fitting topic, since this year marks the 70th anniversary of the Nuremberg Trials.

John Barrett, a law professor St. John's University in Queens, N.Y., has a special interest in Robert Jackson, a former justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and, more pertinent to the Kanee Lecture, the chief prosecutor at the Nuremberg Trials.

"John Barrett was recommended to us by some judges who heard him speak in Winnipeg last fall at a judicial conference," says Ilana Abrams, the Jewish Heritage Centre's general manager. "We were told that he is a fabulous speaker and that we should book him for the Kanee Lecture Series. He may not be as well known as some of our previous speakers, but the topic is interesting and timely."

Abrams said the series attracts 400 to 800 people, depending on the speaker and topic, and raises $50,000 to $55,000 for the centre's programs.

"Because Prof. Barrett is not as well known as some of our earlier speakers, we have to work a little harder to sell tickets," she said. "We are confident, though, that his presentation will be up to the high standards of our previous speakers."

Barrett's resume includes working for the Office of the Independent Counsel probing the Iran-Contra scandal in the later years of the Reagan presidency and for the U.S. Justice department in the mid-1990s before assuming his present position.

While Jackson may be little known today to the general public, his rulings are still much studied in American law schools. "In his time, Robert Jackson was considered to be one of the best lawyers in practice in the United States," Barrett said, "and the best writer to ever sit on the Supreme Court. His writing of opinions is candid and colourful. One idea clearly leads to another."

John Barrett

Jackson was a self-made man, Barrett said. He never graduated from law school although he did attend for a couple of years. He became a lawyer by apprenticing for his uncle, a practising lawyer. He was brought into government by U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt, eventually serving as solicitor general and attorney general before Roosevelt appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1941.

Barrett said president Harry Truman took him away from the bench for a year to be lead prosecutor at the Nuremberg Trials.

"The Nuremberg Trials were the result of a hard and deliberate choice by the Allies, led by the U.S., to bring the top Nazis to justice for their crimes rather than simply allowing them to be shot," Barrett said.

"The trials set out an historical record of the Nazi crimes and the Holocaust, and laid the foundation for the international human rights laws that followed and allowed for the prosecution of the Yugoslavian and Rwandan war criminals and the creation of the International Criminal Court."

In 2003, Barrett edited and published Robert Jackson's lost manuscript, That Man: An Insider's Portrait of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Since then, Barrett has contributed to two books on the Nuremberg Trials and a chapter connected to Jackson on Supreme Court justices and their law clerks. He is currently working on a biography of Jackson. ■

In comparing three pogroms that happened at three different points in Jewish history, political science professor Jeffrey Kopstein claims that some anti-Jewish violence of the "neighbour-on-neighbour" variety was politically, not culturally or ideologically, driven.

Kopstein, of the University of California, Irvine, made this case April 18 at a lecture to a packed room at the University of Toronto.

Titled "The Common History of Violence: Pogroms in Alexandria 38 CE, Valencia 1391 and Lvov 1941," Kopstein's talk was the keynote address of the Schwartz-Reisman Graduate Student Conference in Jewish Studies, presented by the Granovsky-Gluskin Graduate Program at U of T's Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies.

Kopstein, a former director of the centre, outlined some of the conditions and contributing factors that brought about a wave of anti-Jewish violence in three cases: the pogroms in Alexandria, Egypt in 38 CE led by the Greeks and Egyptians; the massacres of Jews under Catholic Church auspices in 1391 in Valencia, Spain; and the pogroms against Jews by Ukrainians and Poles in Lvov, Ukraine, in 1941.

Kopstein argued that in each of these instances, extreme anti-Jewish violence was not due to anti-Semitism, but to political situations in which Jews were seen as threats to a particular group's political or nationalist agenda.

Leading up to the pogrom of 1941, Kopstein said, the Polish and Ukrainian populations of Lvov had felt let down by Soviet rule, and many saw Jews as Soviet accomplices.

When the Germans arrived in the city and discovered the Soviet secret police's prisons full of the corpses of prisoners – largely Ukrainian nationalists – word spread that the "Jewish Bolsheviks" were responsible. Local residents and Ukrainian militia subsequently carried out massacres against the Jews under "the approving eye of the Germans," who infamously told local populations to "do self-cleansing of Communists and Jews," Kopstein said.

But while the Germans' presence caused a sense of chaos, this alone wasn't a necessary condition for the violence.

Rather, he said, the pogroms were a result of the Jews having been significantly involved in Zionist parties at the municipal level for the previous two decades.

"The vote for Zionist parties was four times as high in locations [in Ukraine] where the pogroms happened than in non-pogrom places," Kopstein said.

He noted that at the time, Zionism wasn't focused on going to Israel, but represented "a refusal to join another group's nation-building project."

"The pogroms were the one chance the locals felt they had to rid themselves of what they saw as future political rivals."

In Alexandria, Kopstein said, the pogroms didn't happen because the Alexandrian Greeks and Egyptians disliked the Jews for their strange customs, but because they'd long resented the Jews for siding with the Romans and for attempting to gain full citizenship rights.

"The beginning of Roman rule was associated with competition over citizenship, and this drove the conflict, rather than cultural differences or anti-Semitism," Kopstein said.

Finally, he argued, in Valencia, the pogroms weren't simply, as it appeared, the case of classic Christian anti-Semitism of the period, wherein Jews were targeted for supposedly having killed Christ.

Under the crown of Aragon, Jews were considered "the king's treasure, or patrimony," Kopstein said, and were, therefore, viewed as proponents of royal absolutism and a threat to the Catholic Church. "This encouraged a tendency among Christians to criticize terrestrial sovereignty itself as 'Jewish' or 'Judaizing,'" he said.

In 1391, when a minor inherited the throne, enemies of the crown of Aragon seized the moment of weakness and "sought to redefine the relationship between the kings and the people through an attack on the Jews," Kopstein said.

These pogroms, too, were therefore a matter of the "Jews getting caught up in a political and constitutional battle."

In conclusion, Kopstein clarified that he doesn't want to replace a "one-sided culturalist account" of anti-Jewish violence with "an equally one-sided political and instrumentalist account," but to distinguish between anti-Semitism and politically driven anti-Jewish violence. "The former has been ubiquitous and constant, and for that reason it cannot explain the pattern of variation in the latter," he said. ■

Holocaust memorial unveiled in Suriname

plungen@thecjn.ca

For European Jews, living in the former Dutch colony of Suriname provided numerous benefits over the years. In the early days of the colony on the Atlantic shore of South America, it meant escape from the Spanish Inquisition and a place of refuge for Sephardi Jews. But during World War II, ties to the home country of Holland proved fatal for 105 members of the community.

When war broke out, 15 per cent of the community's 700 residents were abroad – doctors, dentists, businesspeople and others – attending universities or other schools of higher education. They were caught up in the Nazi onslaught and murdered.

On March 18, a memorial was unveiled to commemorate the slain members of the community. The name of each is inscribed in stone, including date of birth, as well as date and place of death.

Government dignitaries, diplomats, representatives of other religions and others joined the Jewish community as it unveiled the memorial monument.

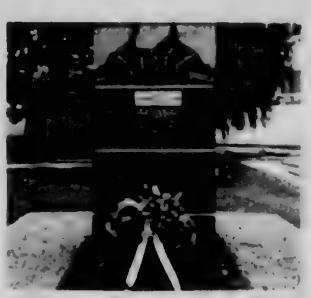
The memorial – matzevah in Hebrew – is located in the courtyard of the Neve Shalom Synagogue in Paramaribo, the capital city. Rectangular and made of imported granite, it was designed by local architect Philip Dikland. Its $13,000 (US) cost was funded by donations from the Jewish American Society for Historic Preservation and 45 people in the United States, Australia, Canada, Suriname and Holland, along with help from the Canadian Friends of Kulanu, a Toronto non-profit group.

The community itself, which played an important role in the country's early history and plantation economy, did not have the financial means to fund the memorial on its own, explained Jacob Steinberg, an Israeli-born Toronto financial consultant.

Steinberg, whose work for a gold mining company took him to Suriname for 2-1/2 years, considers himself part of the Surinamese community, even though he now lives in Richmond Hill, Ont. When he moved to the South American nation, "I didn't know there were Jews in Suriname," he said.

The community's history dates back to the 1630s, when Jews of Portuguese descent arrived from northern Brazil. Further migrations followed. In 1669, they were given special privileges allowing them to establish their own community, known as the Jewish Savannah, as well as freedom of religion, the right to operate a court of justice and their own civil guard.

Steinberg returns to the country periodically and has assisted the community in various endeavours, including raising more than



The unveiling took place March 18 at the Neve Shalom Synagogue in Paramaribo.

$100,000 (US) to clear three cemeteries and erect an iron fence around them.

Lilly Duym is grateful for his assistance. Contacted by phone in Suriname, she said the 200-strong community had for some years hoped to erect a monument, but did not have the means to do so. Its demographics trend to the elderly, and there are only eight children under the age of 12. Over the years, most Jews left for Holland, she said.

Asked to help with the memorial, Steinberg at first was at a loss on how to proceed. He approached a local contractor who'd helped with the cemetery project. He referred him to Dikland, the architect, who agreed to build the monument at cost.

When he told community president Jules Donk what the price would be, Donk responded, "God has his ways."

Donk proved to be right. After he returned to Canada, Steinberg received calls out of the blue from Jerry Klinger, an American who was interested in preserving small Jewish communities and had seen Steinberg's name on a website about the Surinamese community. Hearing of the project, Klinger agreed to contribute $4,000.

A few days later, Steinberg heard from a stranger in Boulder, Colo., who sent a cheque for $2,800 for the project.

Donations continued to arrive, including some from a group of 140 people called the "Chai Membership," who had assisted Steinberg in his earlier efforts to help the Surinamese community.

With the co-operation of Yad Vashem, which added to the known list of Surinamese Shoah victims, the project proceeded. Duym said the unveiling helped educate the broader Surinamese population about a little-known aspect of the Jewish community's history. "The Surinamese people did not know what was going on at that time," she said. "It was very important for us to tell the whole world – all the communities, all the religious groups – that our people were also murdered," she said. ■

Celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut over a good meal

Consulate promotes plan to connect with Israel while enjoying its delicacies

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Is there anything more Jewish than celebrating Israel's 68th birthday by getting together to eat and discuss all the things that are right – and wrong – with the Holy Land?

The Consulate General of Israel in Toronto is marking Israel's Independence Day on May 12 by encouraging the Toronto Jewish community to have a broad conversation about Israel over some shakshuka – or any other quintessential Israeli fare – to help the community connect with Israel and generate ideas for the future.

DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, spoke to The CJN about Israel on the Table, an initiative that he believes is unique to Toronto's Jewish community.

"To my knowledge, it is the first time something like this is being done in Toronto in connection with Yom Ha'atzmaut," he said.

"We're trying to reach more people... We see this as an opportunity for people to celebrate and acknowledge their connection to Israel, but also to explore that connection and to explore it with their friends and family... It creates an opportunity for lots of people to engage on Yom Ha'atzmaut and to connect with Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut in a way that they wouldn't necessarily have. In Israel, the whole country stops and everyone celebrates, but here, it is just another workday."

According to the program's website, participants are asked to register for the program and dedicate a meal between May 12 to 15, the weekend of Yom Ha'atzmaut, to discuss Israel with family, friends or colleagues.

The website offers a basic guidelines, Israeli recipes and conversation topic suggestions, including, "What does Israel mean to you? What excites you most? What upsets you most? What is the most pressing challenge Israel faces today? What is one idea you have to solve it? What ideas do you have to bring Canadians and Israelis closer together?"

In the days following, they'll be asked to reply to a questionnaire about their experience and list any ideas that were generated from the conversations.

DJ Schneeweiss

By registering and completing the questionnaire, participants will be entered into a draw for a free trip for two to Israel, courtesy of El Al airlines.

Schneeweiss said people can choose to have an informal discussion around the Shabbat table with their immediate family, or Jewish community organizations and synagogues can sign on as "super hosts" to have more formal discussions.

"It can be done on a community level. A congregation can get together... and take the opportunity to explore how the institutions, how the community can connect to Israel. What's working? What are some new ideas? Maybe the younger generation has new ideas that we haven't canvassed before," he said.

Schneeweiss hopes the questionnaire will provide useful ideas that come from the discussions.

"Once we get it all together, hopefully this will give us a snapshot of what is on people's minds when it comes to Israel. Hopefully it will generate some interesting, practical ideas. What we'll do with that is then prepare a poll which we will share with the participants and will share with the relevant organizations in the community and in Israel who need to think about how the Jewish world relates to Israel and so on." ■

Pressure mounting to keep French comic out of Canada

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jewish groups believe that French standup comedian Dieudonné, who has an extensive criminal record related to incitement to hatred and violence, in particular toward Jews, should not be allowed into Canada. He is scheduled to give 10 shows next month at a Montreal venue, and the more than 2,000 tickets available are sold out.

B'nai Brith Canada has filed an official complaint with the Canadian Border Services Agency, and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has told the federal government that this "convicted anti-Semitic agitator" should be inadmissible.

The 50-year-old Cameroon-born Dieudonné M'bala M'bala has become infamous for ridiculing the Holocaust and the Nazi-style salute known as the quenelle, as well as for blatant attacks on Jews.

Dieudonné is booked for May 11 to 15 at the 200-seat Espace Mushagalusa on Ontario Street East, a gallery of African art.

Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre also is opposed to Dieudonné's coming here. He tweeted in French on April 22: "A person who incites racial hatred in Europe and is a fomenter of social tensions is not welcome in Montreal." He signed off with the English, "Dieudonné OUT."

The show is titled En Paix (In Peace), and the venue's owner Guy Chigoho said the tickets went quickly after the run was announced via Facebook. Chigoho said that he has reviewed the script of the show Dieudonné is scheduled to give and found "nothing insulting, nothing degrading, nothing racist. I can't be responsible for what he has said in the past."

Dieudonné is also booked for a Trois-Rivières performance and possibly Quebec City.

Dieudonné remains popular with some in the province, despite mounting condemnation against him in Europe. He first performed in Montreal in 2004 at the Just for Laughs Festival, and returned a couple of times afterward until it became obvious to major promoters that his humour had crossed the line from controversial to criminal.

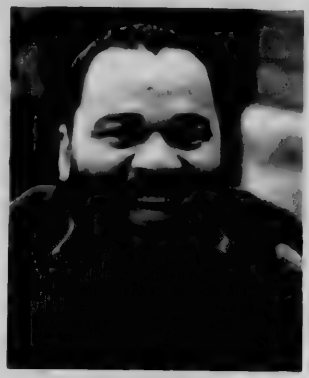
He was last scheduled in Montreal at the Corona Theatre in 2012, but the show was cancelled by promoter Evenko after the Jewish community protested.

Dieudonné is today considered a threat to public security by authorities in France, Belgium, Britain and Hong Kong. He has been repeatedly found guilty of hate speech by French and Belgian courts since 2007.

In January, he was banned from entering and performing in Hong Kong following warnings by the French and Israeli consulates about the nature of his performances. He has been prohibited from entering Britain since 2014.

Within France, he is regularly prevented from going on stage by municipal officials and the Public Security Ministry.

Most recently, in November, the Belgian correctional tribunal in Liège sentenced



Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala

Dieudonné to two months in prison and a 9,000-euro fine for anti-Semitic comments and incitement to genocide. The judgment referred to a 2012 performance in Belgium as a "catalogue of anti-Semitic clichés" and worse, for calling on Christians and Muslims to "unite to kill the Jews."

In March 2015, a Paris tribunal sentenced Dieudonné to two months in jail, which were deferred, for "praising acts of terrorism" after he expressed solidarity with the perpetrator of the murderous attack on a kosher supermarket two months earlier.

The same month, he was ordered to pay a 22,500-euro fine for his show Le Mur (The Wall), which was deemed anti-Semitic.

B'nai Brith Quebec region executive director Harvey Levine said that border services agents have the power to make a decision on the spot whether to admit a person to Canada.

"I'm sure [Dieudonné] has been red-flagged. I'm sure they know who he is," Levine said.

Levine added that B'nai Brith is "astounded" that so many tickets have been sold for the Montreal shows. "It's really scary that so many people want to see that kind of hate speech on stage."

CIJA Quebec public affairs director David Ouellette said his organization is encouraged by remarks issued by federal Immigration Minister John McCallum's office that the matter is being watched, and by Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale. The latter said that Dieudonné's criminal record will be taken into account by border services agents when they make a decision at his point of entry.

Ouellette affirmed that in Quebec's entertainment industry, Dieudonné has become persona non grata, the turning point coming after the French government sought to ban his new show in 2014.

"He is now denounced in Quebec, after for a while being defended on the basis of freedom of speech, or that it was only humour and that he laughed at everyone," Ouellette said.

"It is now clear that this is not humour, but rather the most foul anti-Jewish rhetoric." ■

'I asked them to put themselves in someone else's shoes'

Finally, I looked at the manager and said that I couldn't be 100 per cent sure. Instead of singling out one individual, I asked if I could speak to all of the staff. The manager agreed. To the best of my recollection, this is what I said: "We are in this world together. Yet we often find ourselves in situations with other people about whose circumstances we know very little."

I went on to explain that I had been sitting next to a Holocaust survivor whose entire family was murdered by the Nazis in World War II. I explained that, for Max, Israel represented a ray of hope after that terrible tragedy, and because of that, the obscene gesture had caused him a great deal of pain.

I asked them to consider putting themselves in someone else's shoes, to imagine what it would feel like if someone came to their village, in the middle of a memorial ceremony for their lost sons or daughters, and disrupted it by making a mocking gesture. I suggested that they would feel very hurt, and rightfully so. I concluded by explaining to them that what had happened that morning was that a person who had survived one of the most awful tragedies one can imagine in life was deeply shaken by what he had seen.

> When a Holocaust survivor tells you you've done the right thing, you feel a measure of reassurance

My final plea to them was this: "Before you do anything, try to ask yourself: what is going on in someone else's life? What are the ramifications of my actions? That's all I'm asking you to do. Hopefully, one day, we'll find peace in this world, between Arabs and Jews, and between all people. And it will only begin when we ask ourselves this question: what is it like to be in someone else's shoes."

After I left, I wasn't sure about my response. Was I too conciliatory? Should I have been more retributive? When I returned to my hotel room, I called Max to ask him if he thought I did the right thing. Max said, yes, he thought so, asking what would it have achieved to have this young man fired. It might have made him even more embittered. And what would that have accomplished?

I sighed a sigh of relief. When a Holocaust survivor tells you you've done the right thing, you feel a measure of reassurance. But I could tell that neither he nor I were absolutely sure what the right course of action actually was. I do know this, though: whatever our past traumas and grievances, the approach Roman Kent offered in January 2015 at that ceremony marking the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau is the most noble one.

And I pray for a day when all people in the world – regardless of past trauma and suffering – come to the realization that "hate is never right and love is never wrong." ■

Labour in denial about anti-Semitism: Israeli envoy

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's new ambassador to the United Kingdom said parts of Britain's left are "in denial" about the "disease" of anti-Semitism.

Speaking to the Sunday Times, May 1, Mark Regev addressed a rising tide of anti-Semitic outbursts by Labour party members, including most recently Ken Livingstone, who was suspended from the party last week for declaring and continuing to insist that Adolf Hitler was initially a Zionist.

"I have no doubt that part of the left is in denial. They say 'anti-Semitism, that's the right, that's the fascists.' That's a cop-out. It doesn't stand up to serious historical examination," Regev said in the interview, which ran on the newspaper's front page.

"Anti-Semitism should concern everyone. When it does raise its ugly head, it should be condemned across the board. And failure to condemn has to be in itself condemned," the Israeli envoy added, in remarks that the British paper said would likely be interpreted as an attack on Labour Leader Jeremy Corbyn.

On April 29, Corbyn called for an independent inquiry into anti-Semitism and racism within the Labour party, after initially denying there was a problem. This came a day after former mayor and veteran Labour politician Livingstone said Hitler was a supporter of Zionism before he "went mad" and killed six million Jews during World War II.

Israel's Labor chief, Isaac Herzog, called Livingstone's remarks "repulsive," and offered to show UK Labour leaders around the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum to remind them of "the painful realities that they have perhaps forgotten, but we remember every day."

Regev said he hoped Corbyn would take up Herzog's weekend invitation.

Regev also praised British Prime Minister David Cameron for his "outspoken and unequivocal" denunciations of anti-Jewish hatred. "That's leadership," he said.

Livingstone's comments have sparked an ongoing uproar, prompting his suspension from the party and the condemnation of a large number of Labour MPs, some of whom called for him to be expelled.

Labour MP John Mann, who was among the first to condemn his colleague, calling him a "Nazi apologist," said last Saturday the Labour party has "no reason to exist" if it fails to denounce and shake off anti-Semitism.

Israeli Ambassador to the UK Mark Regev

"Hitler started with the Jews, as others have done in persecutions throughout history. But it never ends with the Jews," wrote Mann in an op-ed in the Mirror.

"That is why Labour has always prided itself in upholding the rights of the Jewish people and has always been the Party that never tolerates anti-Semitism.

"If we cannot do that now, then we have no reason to exist," he wrote.

After doubling down on his comments April 29, Livingstone further refused to apologize directly and defended his comments by charging that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu essentially said the same thing several months ago.

"How can I have hurt and offended the Jewish community when the prime minister of Israel said exactly the same thing?" Livingstone said in an interview with LBC radio station. He cited comments made by Netanyahu last October suggesting that Hitler had not initially intended to annihilate the Jews, only expel them from Europe, and that the idea of extermination came from Jerusalem's then-grand mufti, Haj Amin Husseini, a Palestinian nationalist widely acknowledged as a fervent Jew-hater.

"If the prime minister of Israel can say, two days before, exactly what I said, it can't mean that I'm anti-Semitic – and he's certainly not anti-Semitic," alleged Livingstone, giving an incorrect timeline of Netanyahu's statements and falsely implying that Netanyahu had suggested Hitler supported Zionism.

Livingstone said he would "invite the prime minister of Israel to come over and defend me, as he clearly agrees with what I said," according to the Telegraph.

British historian and journalist Andrew Roberts wrote last week that Livingstone knew full well that Hitler was no Zionist and that his remarks were intentionally made to offend as many Jews as possible.

"The sole reason Ken Livingstone brought up the Fuehrer in his interview was to be as vicious and loathsome as he possibly could to any Jews listening, rather than genuinely intending to make some valid historical point about the migration policies of the putative Third Reich in the 1930s," Roberts wrote in an article on CapX, a news website, adding "he must know perfectly well that the very insertion of the word 'Hitler' in the context of a debate over anti-Semitism would create precisely the effect that it has.

"It was therefore a totally cold-blooded attempt to offend the maximum amount of Jews to the maximum extent," Roberts wrote.

In a letter published by the Guardian, 83 Jewish members and supporters of the Labour party rejected assertions that the Labour party had an anti-Semitism problem and said the accusations were "part of a wider campaign against the Labour leadership, and they have been timed particularly to do damage to the Labour party and its prospects in elections in the coming week.

"As Jews, we are appalled that a serious issue is being used in this cynical and manipulative way, diverting attention from much more widespread examples of Islamophobia and xenophobia in the Conservative and other parties," they wrote, adding "we dissociate ourselves from the misleading attacks on Labour from some members of the Jewish community."

The Livingstone controversy erupted a day after Corbyn, a bitter critic of Israel who has referred to Hamas and Hezbollah representatives as "friends," reluctantly suspended MP Naz Shah, who had called for the dismantling of Israel, compared Israelis to Hitler and posted pro-Hamas tweets.

Senior UK Labour party lawmakers have called on Corbyn to take firmer action against anti-Semitism among its members, in light of the anti-Semitic remarks by Livingstone, Shah, and others. ■

Next year, not this year, in Jerusalem for Pesach

Israelis enjoy the beaches of the Kinneret, the Sea of Galilee, in northern Israel, during Passover on April 26. Despite low turnout from foreigners this Passover, internal tourism was still very good. HADAS PARUSH/FLASH90 PHOTO

LINDA GRADSTEIN
THE MEDIA LINE

The traditional Passover seder meal ends with a promise, "Next year in Jerusalem." But at least this year, many American Jews chose to stay away.

"There were far, far fewer tourists this year," Mark Feldman, the CEO of Ziontours in Jerusalem told the Media Line. "Many people were scared to come. They felt that the Old City of Jerusalem was off limits completely and that Jerusalem itself was not safe."

Several hotels contacted for this article refused to release figures on their occupancy over Passover, but Feldman said hotel occupancy, especially in Jerusalem, was down by 20 or 30 per cent over last year.

"Tourists plan their travel way in advance," Feldman said. "They had to decide in November or December, when the situation here was very unstable."

He was referring to what came to be known as the "knife intifadah" in which Palestinians, many of them young, stabbed and killed 30 people, most of them Israelis over the past six months. While the situation has calmed down, a bombing on a Jerusalem bus last month that killed only the attacker but wounded 21, sparked anxiety again.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism says it doesn't have exact figures for tourism yet but that the situation was "not bad," according to Pini Shani, the deputy director of the marketing administration of the Ministry of Tourism. He said looking at monthly statistics can be complicated, because it depends on other issues such as whether Passover and Easter fall in the same month or in different months. He said that estimates are that about three million tourists will visit Israel this year, similar to 2015.

Tourism during Passover tends to be primarily internal by Israelis, say tourism experts. In March, hotels were 58 per cent full, said Pnina Shalev, the spokesperson for the Israel Hotels Association, while in 2015, it was 55 per cent. The summer 2014 fighting between Israel and the Islamist Hamas in Gaza, affected tourism, which usually sees hotels 60-70 per cent full in March.

"Passover was great with 80-90 per cent occupancy in most places," Shalev told the Media Line. "Eilat (on the Red Sea) was full of Israelis, as was the Dead Sea, Tiberias, and the kibbutzim (collective settlements)."

Israel is also turning eastward, hoping to tap into the burgeoning Chinese market. Shani said that tourism from India and China is increasing quickly, he said, and Hainan Airlines, the largest private carrier in China, recently launched its first direct flight to Israel. Tourism officials say they hope to see 100,000 tourists from China visiting Israel each year.

Israel has also seen a sharp decline in visitors from Russia, which is Israel's second largest market after the United States, due to the sharp financial crisis there.

Overall Israel, with an average of three to three and a half million tourists annually remains far behind other Mediterranean countries like Greece, which has 25 million visitors a year despite the financial crisis there, or Turkey, with close to 40 million tourists.

Many of those who work in tourism are concerned that the downturn in tourism could become permanent.

"In the summer of 2014 with the operation in Gaza, I had a lot of cancellations and I've had very little work since then," Suzanne Pomeranz, a longtime tour guide originally from North Carolina told the Media Line. "Yesterday I was talking to a high school friend and he said, 'Why don't you come home? There's a war in Israel,' and I said there is no war here but that's the way it looks to everyone." ■

Israeli soldier motivated by 'twisted ideology': report

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

An internal Israeli military document leaked to Vice News states that Sgt. Elor Azaria, the IDF soldier charged with manslaughter for shooting and killing a Palestinian attacker in Hebron last March after he had been neutralized, was motivated by a "twisted ideology," the website said.

The 17-page document issued by military prosecutors investigating the case, stated that Azaria, a 19-year-old sergeant in the Kfir infantry brigade, told other soldiers both before and after the shooting that the assailant "needs to die."

It also stated that Azaria changed his version of events during his questioning, saying he had shot "because I felt there was a threat to my life."

The shooting took place March 24 in Hebron, a West Bank city that has been a focal point of a seven-month wave of Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Two Palestinians stabbed and lightly wounded a soldier before troops killed one of them and shot and wounded the other. A video later showed one of the attackers, Abdul Fatah al-Sharif, still alive minutes later before Azaria shot him in the head.

Azaria's defence team has said he believed al-Sharif was wearing an explosive vest when he shot him.

The leaked report noted that both assailants had been checked by another soldier prior to Azaria's arrival at the scene, who confirmed that they no longer posed any danger.

Azaria, standing nearby, reportedly told a comrade that "a terrorist that wounded their friend needs to die." The second soldier tried to calm him, telling him their friend would be fine, but Azaria then stepped forward and fired a shot at al-Sharif's head, hitting him.

When questioned by the company commander as to why he had shot the man, Azaria once again said, "He's a terrorist, he needs to die," the report noted. It was only after he was detained and an investigation was launched that Azaria began claiming he had believed the assailant still posed a danger.

"The facts speak for themselves," Vice quotes an investigator as saying. "The company medic took the decision to shoot the terrorist due to a twisted ideology."

The document was also said to be critical of the soldiers' failure to treat al-Sharif as he lay wounded on the ground, before Azaria shot him.

Other contributors warned that the incident could gravely damage Israel and the IDF's image in the world.

In summary, the most senior investigator in the report stated that "shooting at the terrorist while he is on the floor with almost no movement, and is bleeding for a few minutes after the terror attack happened, is a significantly immoral action and there is no good explanation for this... The shooting serves the Palestinian claims about executions and by this hurts the legitimacy of our actions.

"I expect and order in the clearest way that the IDF forces in the West Bank will do their best to ensure medical treatment to every Palestinian including terrorists that (have) attacked and (have) stopped being dangerous."

A military court indicted Azaria for manslaughter in the fatal shooting of al-Sharif. He was also charged with inappropriate military conduct.

Azaria was released for two days from his on-base detention to join his family for the Passover holiday. Azaria was welcomed home by friends and family to hugs, songs and cheers.

"Thanks for the support. Thanks to the judges who allowed him to have the holiday at home. With God's help this whole thing will end and we'll go back to being a normal family," the soldier's father, Charlie, told reporters outside the family home in Ramla. "We love Israel, we're not enemies of the state." ■

KING DAVID
Passover The Pizza
Well, we made it out of Egypt. Again. And it's safe to say that after 40 years of wandering the desert, all of us - from Moses to the burning bush - could go for a nosh.
The point is Passover has come and gone, so let's add some leaven to that bread once more.
At King David Pizza Products we prepare our pizzas by hand, only using fresh and all natural ingredients. Then we bake them in a stone oven using the same delicious recipe King David Pizza has used for the past 25 years.
And our dedication to quality isn't just something we talk about — it's something you can taste for yourself. Because we know the last thing anyone wants to take a bite out of, is something that tastes like the freezer.
That's why we keep our process simple: fresh kosher ingredients, no preservatives and no artificial flavours. Leaving you with a meal-sized snack you can feel good about serving.
So put the matza back on the shelf, gather around the table, and enjoy a healthier alternative that'll make you say "mamma mia". But in Hebrew.
Real Ingredients. Authentic Flavours.

Israel denies rift with Germany over two-state solution

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

A senior official in Jerusalem dismissed a report on April 30 that claimed Germany was becoming increasingly frustrated with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's policies.

"Ties between Israel and Germany are close and good, and they will continue to be," the official told Ha'aretz, adding that the statements in the report published by the German weekly Der Spiegel were "most likely an internal German attempt to bash Angela Merkel over her close relationship with Netanyahu."

A report in Der Spiegel's latest edition said that Merkel's camp was "furious" at a leak of confidential consultations between Jerusalem and Berlin in the German capital in February, which subsequently appeared in the free Israel Hayom daily.

Furthermore, the magazine said, the leaked details of Merkel's remarks were "twisted" to give the impression that she supported Netanyahu's position that a two-state solution with the Palestinians was currently unfeasible, whereas the chancellor had actually said that Israeli settlement construction "makes it unlikely that a viable Palestinian state can be established in accordance with plans aimed at a two-state solution."

(The Times of Israel reported at the time that the German government was displeased with Netanyahu for asserting that Merkel had changed her stance on a two-state solution, and that it dispatched emissaries to Jerusalem clarify Berlin's position.)

The report also claimed that Netanyahu was having a deleterious effect on Israeli-German relations, to the extent that "many, particularly in the Berlin Foreign Ministry, have begun wondering if Germany sent the wrong signals in the past." This shift by Berlin, Der Spiegel said, could be seen in Germany's vote in a January 2016 resolution by the European Union on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Prior to the vote, Netanyahu called German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier to seek reassurance over a paragraph in the draft resolution criticizing settlement construction.

"I'm counting on you," Netanyahu told Steinmeier, the report said. But the foreign minister voted in favour of the draft, with the wording condemning settlement expansion unchanged.

According to Der Spiegel, the Merkel government has "lost hope that the peace process can be revived so long as Netanyahu remains in office."

Another manifestation of this view came when Merkel met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in Berlin some two weeks ago. The chancellor, the report said, "was demonstrative in her support."

"I understand why President Abbas continually seeks out the Security Council," Merkel said, according to the report. The magazine added that, "Even accusations from Netanyahu that EU labeling rules for products made in the settlements are akin to an anti-Jewish boycott are no longer taken seriously." ■

ADL tells Trump to abstain from using the term 'America First'

JTA
WASHINGTON

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) called on Donald Trump to abjure the term "America First," noting its unsavoury World War II-era association with anti-Semitism.

"The undercurrents of anti-Semitism and bigotry that characterized the America First movement – including the assumption that Jews who opposed the movement had their own agenda and were not acting in America's best interest – is fortunately not a major concern today," the ADL said in an April 28 statement.

Trump, the leading contender for the Republican presidential nomination, unveiled his foreign policy in a speech April 27 in Washington and said "America First will be the major and overriding theme of my administration."

He referred to a policy that would not attempt to export democracy, that would avoid foreign wars, and that would require allies to pay for America's defence or go it alone.

"For many Americans, the term 'America First' will always be associated with and tainted by this history," ADL CEO Jonathan Greenblatt said in the statement. "In a political season that already has prompted a national conversation about civility and tolerance, choosing a call to action historically associated with incivility and intolerance seems ill-advised."

The ADL has called Trump out for his campaign rhetoric, including his broadsides against Muslims. ■

Bibi responds to 'French initiative'

JTA
JERUSALEM

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel is ready to start "direct, bilateral negotiations" with the Palestinians.

The invitation, which Netanyahu has repeatedly extended, was included in a statement issued April 28 by the Prime Minister's Office under the heading "Israel's Response to the French Initiative."

The French government announced on April 21 that it will convene a summit of foreign ministers in Paris May 30 as a start to renewing the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians. The meeting will not include representatives of Israel and the Palestinians.

The summit is set to be the run-up to an international peace conference to be held in the French capital this summer that would include Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"Israel adheres to its position that the best way to resolve the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is direct, bilateral negotiations," the statement issued April 28 said. "Israel is ready to begin them immediately without preconditions. Any other diplomatic initiative distances the Palestinians from direct negotiations."

French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault angered Israel in January for threatening to recognize a Palestinian state if a Paris-hosted conference failed to relaunch peace talks. Ayrault backtracked on his statements in March, saying the conference would not "automatically" spur any action. ■

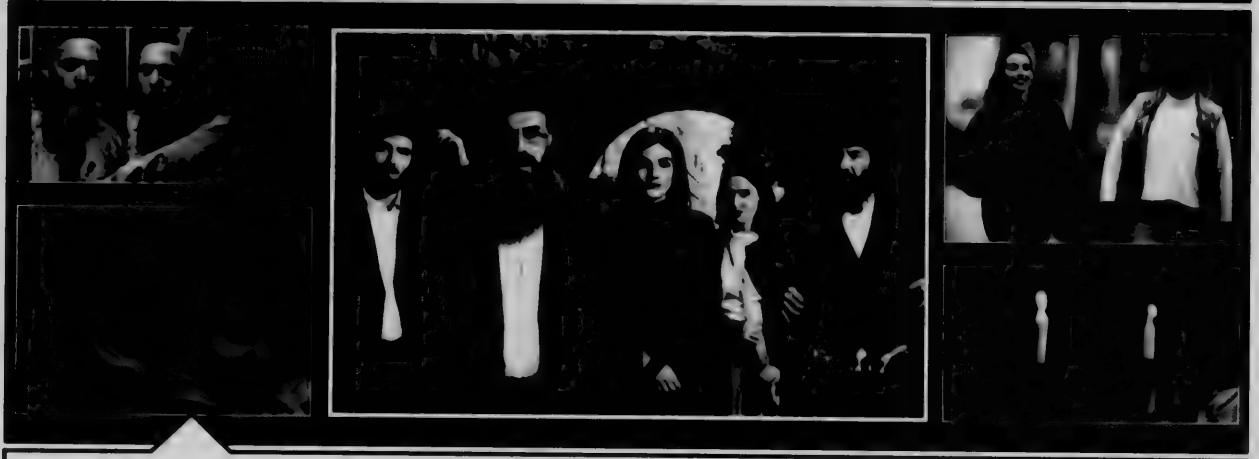
Jewish Life



Wide selection of films at 24th edition of TJFF

JOSEPH SERGE
jserge@thecjn.ca

David Bezmozgis's screen adaptation of his story Natasha will open the 2016 Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

From May 5 to 16, the 24th edition of the festival will screen four world premieres, 11 North American and 31 Canadian premieres.

Natasha, a coming-of-age story, explores the modern life of Toronto's Russian Jewish community through the eyes and imagination of the award-winning writer and filmmaker.

The festival closes with Every Face Has a Name, the Canadian premiere of the documentary about Operation White Buses in which over 15,000 people were rescued from several concentration camps in 1945 and brought to Sweden. Seventy years later, filmmaker Magnus Gertten tracked down some of these refugees to show them original, rarely-seen newsreel footage of their arrival in Malmo. While watching this footage of themselves, survivors remember faces, names and stories about friends and family.

In between these two films is a wide selection of dramas, comedies, documentaries and special features.

This year's sidebar series "Jewish images from a Golden Age of Canadian Television" explores expressions of Jewish identity from the first 12 years of CBC Television (1952-64). This includes a look at the comedy duo of Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster, as well as writer and filmmaker Jack Kuper and actor Sylvia Lennick. (See page 30).

The Senegalese/French documentary Black Jews, the Roots of the Olive Tree will have its Canadian premiere as part of the "Black Jewish Relations" series. It takes a unique look at the Jews of Cameroon, a community that observes Jewish prayer and customs in a country not always understanding of this foreign religion.

Doing Jewish: A Story from Ghana also gets its world premiere. This Canadian film follows Gabrielle Zilkha, a Canadian filmmaker working in Ghana, who sets off across the country to celebrate Rosh Hashanah with the tiny Sefwi Jewish community.

The Jewish state is featured in a series commemorating Israel at 68. Among the highlights in this series are Einstein in the Holy Land, an exploration of Albert Einstein's life, and political views on Israel. Hagiga – The Story of Israeli Cinema is a two-part look at Israel's rich cinematic history. (page 29) and Sabena Hijacking: My Version is a suspenseful blow-by-blow account of the 1972 Black September attack on an airplane in Tel Aviv. Foodies will love In Search of Israeli Cuisine, a documentary about a country constantly attempting to redefine its identity.

"Women – Front and Centre" features several films and documentaries in which women play a primary role. Imagine: Bette Midler – The Divine Miss M is a must-see look at the funny and outrageous Bette Midler. In the Canadian premiere of the 2014 French film Papa Was Not a Rolling Stone, director Sylvie Ohayon delivers a sensitive comedy-drama about growing up Jewish in La Courneuve, an impoverished suburb of Paris in the mid-'80s. It will be screened with Mushkie, an Israeli short about two best friends and what happens when one of them experiences an embarrassing medical problem.

There are lots of dramas, thrillers, romances and comedies, of course. Highly recommended is the Canadian premiere of the Israeli film Freak Out (Mesuvag Harig). In this dark comedy, 18-year-old Matan is serving in the army and is frightened and misses his mother. When strange things begin to happen on guard duty, he realizes that none of them will likely get out alive.

Called an Israeli Dr. Strangelove, Atomic Falafel takes on the Israel-Iran nuclear showdown. A widowed falafel seller, his awkward teenage daughter, her computer nerd boyfriend and a German weapons inspector save the region from potential nuclear war.

Ed Mirvish, Big Carrot's David Teitel and architect Benjamin Brown are among the Canadians featured in several documentaries airing at the festival.

And not to be missed is season 2 of the Israeli TV show Shtisel. The six episodes will be shown in two screenings.

This just touches the surface of what promises to be another successful festival. ■

The TJFF runs May 5 to 15 at five theatres across the city. For full schedule and ticket information visit tjff.com

Three comedies to watch at the TJFF

Michael Fraiman

The 2016 Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from May 5 to 15, and you'd be forgiven for claiming you don't have enough time to research every one of the dozens of features and shorts being screened.

But if the festival's spot-on branding is any indication (Have a beard? "Jewish enough"), the comedy offerings should fill up nicely. For those tired of equating Jewish cinema with Holocaust documentaries and nebbish romantic leads, read on.

(A disclaimer apology to the majority of Canadians who undoubtedly – and justifiably – resent the propagation of Toronto-centric media, but look: we've got a pretty big Jewish film festival here, and there are funny-looking movies worth checking out.)

How to Win Enemies
(May 7, 9 p.m.; May 11, 6:30 p.m.)
Tackling the distance between fiction and reality is well-trodden territory. (Can washed-up sci-fi actors survive a real-life galaxy quest? Is Pleasantville really all that pleasant?) But in Gabriel Lichtmann's latest feature, the stakes are more personal: Lucas, a young, handsome lawyer withdraws enough cash to buy a house, only to find it missing the morning after a one-night stand.

An Argentine entry with European style, Lichtmann's feature is undeniably Jewish (there's a wedding, chupah and all), but doesn't appear to bank on that theme for jokes. Instead, Lucas' main trait is being a mystery-novel fan, and the film mines his trove of suspense fiction for clues as to how to solve his own case. Complete with funky jazz and deadpan punchlines, this Jewish Nine Queens-style heist comedy should be one of the more sophisticated films on the 2016 roster.

That Daughter's Crazy (May 11, 8:30 p.m.)
Of all the famous comics from the 1960s and '70s to influence Jewish culture, Richard Pryor does not come to mind. Yet, here is his daughter, Rain Pryor, half-Jewish on her mother's side, who's been performing a one-woman show called Fried Chicken and Latkes about her distinct upbringing – neither Jewish nor black enough to fit into either community. That Daughter's Crazy isn't strictly a comedy – the late Pryor's notoriously complicated life included civil disobedience and seven marriages – but Rain seems as vibrantly extroverted as her father was.

The difficult, long-standing relationship between the black and Jewish communities is something of a theme this year at the TJFF (among the selections: Black Jews, about Cameroon's Jewish community; Doing Jewish: A Story From Ghana, which seems quietly heartbreaking; the coming-of-age Papa Was Not A Rolling Stone; and A Demonstration in the White City, following Eritrean and Sudanese refugees in Israel). That Daughter's Crazy complements this narrative well, detailing the history of those who grew up in the 20th century between two persecuted minorities, either expected to pick sides or forced to forge a new identity between both.

Atomic Falafel
(May 12, 9 p.m.)
It's astonishing that no filmmakers have yet made an Israeli version of Dr. Strangelove. The threat of global nuclear annihilation could hardly be positioned more acutely than in the Middle East –something that Tel Aviv-based director Dror Shaul clearly understood when making this film.

But just in case the premise was too sensitive, he named his opus Atomic Falafel, ensuring that nobody could possibly mistake this movie for anything but slapstick comedy. I'll confess I'm not 100 per cent sure what the whole thing's about – the trailer's a hodgepodge of Israel Defence Forces officers ripped from Full Metal Jacket, awkward teenage sexuality, a falafel truck, the Ayatollah, adult circumcision and nuclear war rooms, all wrapped up in Hebrew, English and Farsi. At only 80 minutes, it'll be impressive to see it all pulled off. ■

Festival's sidebar series looks at CBC's early Jewish flavour

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When did the CBC ever have a Jewish flavour? Apparently, as soon it discovered television.

Following in the footsteps of early American TV programs with Milton Berle and Sid Caesar, and the series The Goldbergs, the Mother Corp acquired a certain tam.

The venerable broadcaster's first dozen or so TV years are the subject of a sidebar series at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival (May 5-15). "Jewish Images from a Golden Age of Canadian Television" is devoted to exploring expressions of Jewish identity on CBC-TV from roughly 1952 to 1964.

It was a time of immense creativity. "During this almost-forgotten era of inspired drama and comedy, expressions of Canada's ethnic diversity began to appear on TV," writes TJFF program director Stuart Hands in this year's festival program. "Among these CBC shows, one can also find drama and comedy that reflect the lives of Jewish immigrants and children of immigrants at the time."

Hands got the idea for the series following last year's festival tribute to the late Al Waxman and the screening of writer and filmmaker Jack Kuper's 1959 autobiographical CBC production, Sun in My Eyes.

Hands and Kuper started talking about the era, and "it's fascinating," Hands told The CJN. "When you consider all the [Jewish] directors, writers and actors who were there, it's really quite amazing, this sort of community that was.

"Canadian Jews don't know a lot about this history. It was a revelation to me. I thought it would be a revelation to do at [this year's] festival."

The series focuses on three significant Jewish contributors to the CBC of those days: Kuper, the comedy team of Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster, and actor Sylvia Lennick.

Moving from radio to TV in 1954, Wayne and Shuster "presented to their audience who they were – university-educated children of Jewish immigrants," Hands writes in the program. "Although their Jewish roots were rarely openly addressed – other than scattered expressions understood primarily by their Jewish audiences – their urbanity and sophistication spoke to a diverse Canadian population, as well as international fans."

Lennick, who was married to fellow CBC mainstay Ben Lennick, may be best remembered for playing Calpurnia, Julius Caesar's wife, in the Wayne and Shuster sketch in which she delivered the immortal warning, in a Bronx drawl, "I told him: Julie, don't go! It's the Ides of March! Beware, already!"

Kuper, a Polish-born child survivor of the Holocaust, began at the CBC in 1952 as a graphic artist and went on to create some of the broadcaster's most memorable teleplays and films, many based on his experiences.

The CBC series promises that "even a young William Shatner makes an appearance." (It's in the 1955 drama On A Streetcar, written by Kuper).

By the early 1950s, the CBC had something it "never had before: a considerably Jewish flavour," Mavor Moore, the writer, producer, actor and polymath is quoted in Mary Jane Miller's 1996 book Rewind and Search, a look at the heady early days of CBC television drama.

Moore recounted that he and another executive once drew up a list of appointments. It "contained the names of a half dozen very able young Jewish men and women, and the reason was enormously simple: they hadn't been given a chance before."

It was presented to the director of television, who looked up and said, "a lot of Jewish names on that list."

It was a time of "a great deal of anti-Semitism at the CBC," Moore noted. Actor Lorne Green, apparently, had difficulties. So did John Adaskin, who went on to success in radio.

Kuper recalled his early days at the CBC as "a struggle. We were all learning how to do it and fighting to get what we did accepted."

It was uphill, he told The CJN, if "you were stupid enough to step out of the norm, like I did, by writing about subjects and people I knew. This was not the norm, the way people running the CBC understood life. [It was] not what they were looking for or knew or understood or expected to see. Naturally, it was not easily accepted."

While he did not encounter overt anti-Semitism, resistance from CBC brass sprang from their "non-acceptance of the other."

Still, it was "an amazing place. I could not believe I was working there and getting paid. It was my education. Without the CBC, I don't know where I would have ended up." ■

Love story depicts moral crumbling of prewar Germany

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A great deal has been written about Germany between the two world wars of the last century. The rise of the Nazis is well documented in history and in literature. One of the seminal works remains The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, the magnum opus published in 1960 by William Shirer, the American journalist who reported from Berlin in the 1930s until the United States entered the war on the side of the Allies. In 1941, Shirer published his first-hand observations of Germany's startling descent into an ugly, military-industrial, genocidal superstructure in A Berlin Diary.

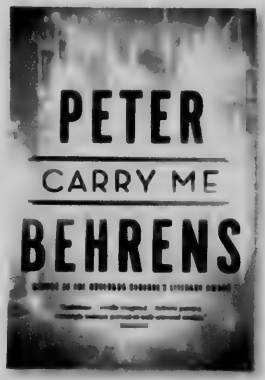
Christopher Isherwood, the British-American author, wrote about the seedy, morally unravelling underside of Berlin society in the 1920s and 1930s. His novel Goodbye to Berlin eventually formed the basis for the famous musical Cabaret, which so painfully portrayed the unique evil of Nazism.

Over the intervening years, many scholars and authors have brought their considerable skills to chronicling and trying to "make sense" of what – at its core – has no explanation in sense or logic: how does brazen hatred acquire such an unbreakable, steel-jawed hold over an entire society?

And though the question may have no answer, our minds continue to search for one.

In his new novel Carry Me, the Canadian-born, award-winning author Peter Behrens touchingly, tenderly and provocatively asks that question, many compelling variations upon that question, and much more.

The two key characters of Carry Me are Billy Lange and Karin von Weinbrenner, unlikely lovers whose eventual escape from Nazi Germany is the central thread



Carry Me
By Peter Behrens
(Anansi Press 2016)

of Behrens' compelling work. The title of the story derives from a scene in the couple's younger life when Karin asks Billy to carry her. The memory of that scene stays with Billy forever. He literally and metaphorically carries Karin many more times, especially through the harrowing, dangerous shards of their broken society. Their escape from Germany is the narrative culmination of the story.

Behrens cleverly begins the tale well before Billy and Karin are born, and he deftly develops for us their formative background. Carry Me starts with the stories of Billy and Karin's parents and transports us across numerous horizons in the Pacific Ocean, the coastline of the British Isles, continental Europe, the United States and even Canada.

He examines the breakdown of German society in the years prior to World War II by first exploring the tensions within civil European society prior to World War I. Just as the main individuals in Behrens' story are interconnected in myriad profound ways, so, too, are the stormy political and ideological events through which his characters live. His narrative takes the reader through a number of conflicts, including the unfathomable slaughter of World War I, the struggle for Irish independence from British rule, World War II and the first moments of the ultimate genocide of the Jews.

Billy's father was a German national. British authorities interned him in a camp for suspect foreigners during the long, cruel war. His sorrowful experiences there affect him for the rest of his life. Behrens makes the point that discrimination, oppression and mistreatment of the "other" is not the exclusive domain of one nationality or one people.

The author describes the aftermath of World War I: the emotional distress, emptiness and the constant ache at the heart of those societies that sent their soldiers to die in the war's bloodied fields. "You could say that in Frankfurt – probably England and France, too - the dead were in charge. Millions were walking about the cities with memories of dead sons, fathers, husbands operating painfully on their minds."

In Germany's societal emptiness, the vile worm of anti-Semitism thrived. It twisted and turned its immoral, deathly ideology deep into the body of an increasingly vulnerable society. Scapegoats were sought to explain away the military and other failures of the German volk. "It was the Jews!" the thugs and tyrants screamed. The Jews – both the bankers and the Bolsheviks – became the national hanging rack on which the suffering, the exploited and the willfully murderous pinned their woe.

For instance, Behrens shows us Billy's classmate who, in Frankfurt in 1932, explained with full conspiratorial effusion that Germany lost the war because of a bet the Frankfurt Jews made with the Jews of London.

"You see fellows, they each wagered on the other country to win. Each tribe figured they could fix the fight! Yids are utterly ruthless. Our tribe of Jews caused the defeat of Germany and collected millions of pounds in reward. They were able to stab in the back the best army the world had ever seen."

Behrens' depiction of the moral crumbling of prewar Germany is narrated from the varied perspective of many individuals with whom we become familiar, the good folk who are caught up in it and the villainous folk who contribute to it.

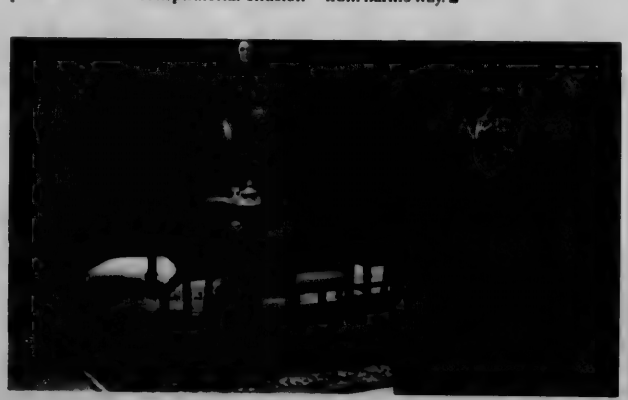
He is also brutally honest about how villainy eventually triumphed. When marauding Nazi brutes violently close in upon increasing numbers of individuals whom Billy knows, he admits candidly and somewhat shamefully, "I wasn't going to rock the boat... [M]y generation knew the smart thing was to stay away from other people's trouble."

But the troubles of other people inevitably became Billy's troubles, too.

Behrens brings the reader into the ghastly centre of prewar Nazi Germany, when all morality was turned on its head, when the institutions of the state brutalized its own citizenry. The despairingly dark description of that place and time dominates Carry Me.

But Carry Me is equally and perhaps even more memorably a lush, beautifully crafted story about the complicated relationships between individuals – friends, parents, children and lovers.

Behrens stunningly, though dolefully, reminds us with a clarity, artistry and poignant punch demonstrated by few writers, that despite the innumerable ways in which love anchors and sustains life, it cannot always keep those whom we love from harm's way. ■



Toronto actor takes on two roles in theatre double bill

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto-based actor Alon Nashman's latest role is one of biblical proportions. That's because he's playing Lot in Sunday in Sodom, a feminist retelling of the Sodom and Gomorrah story.

It's one of two new plays by the Governor General's Award-winning Canadian playwright, Jordan Tannahill, that the Canadian Stage is mounting at the Berkley Street Theatre from April 26 to May 15.

Tannahill's double bill will include Sunday in Sodom along with Botticelli in the Fire, which explores the religious fervour that gripped Renaissance-era Florence, as its citizens – led by Dominican friar Girolamo Savonarola – burned licentious items such as art, books and even mirrors.

In that play, Nashman is Savonarola. "It's a beautifully drawn role of somebody who is very sincerely devout and who is able to inflame the people to identify their problems as being caused by the luxurious tastes and the immorality of the ruling classes," says Nashman. He describes his character as a populist and a dogmatist who whips Florence into a zealous frenzy.

"The other play is a kind of modern midrash to explain why Lot's wife turns around," he says of Sunday in Sodom. The show unfolds from Lot's wife's (played by Valerie Buhagiar) perspective.

It's set in Sodom, yet this ancient metropolis exists in the modern-day world. There are CNN news broadcasts on television as the city is under the imminent threat of attack.

Alon Nashman plays Lot and Dominican friar Girolamo Savararola.

> It's a beautifully drawn role of somebody who is very sincerely devout and who is able to inflame the people to identify their problems as being caused by the luxurious tastes and the immorality of the ruling classes.

The show starts with a call from Isaac (Stephen Jackman-Torkoff) to Lot's wife; Isaac is scared because his father just tried to kill him. Lot's story doesn't take up too much room in Genesis, but Nashman notes that Tannahill's version stays true to the text while greatly expanding upon it.

And although Tannahill has written two distinct plays, they maintain a clear thematic link; both deal with the devastating consequences of unrestricted hedonism. They're also connected by certain musical and visual cues.

For this production, CanStage partnered with the department of theatre at York University and two graduating MFA students are directing the shows.

Matjash Mrozewski is directing Botticelli in the Fire. She's a well known choreographer who's now making the leap to theatre. Estelle Shook is leading Sunday in Sodom; she was the artistic director of British Columbia's Caravan Farm Theatre.

Nashman describes the two as the most innovative directors he has worked with in years.

Along with these two plays, Nashman will also be performing an offstage role at the Tarragon Theatre's technological thriller The Summoned from April 27 until May 29. He'll also be narrating Tafelmusik's Tales of Two Cities: The Leipzig-Damascus Coffee House from May 19 to 24.

For now though, he's looking forward to having audiences see Tannahill's latest work for the first time. "It's just amazing what Jordan has done in terms of riffing on the Bible," says Nashman. "It's entertaining and devastating material." ■

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

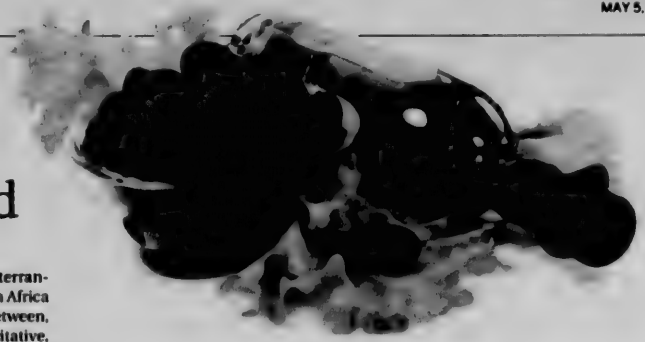
Everything you've always wanted to know about Mediterranean food



SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Large communities of Jews have lived in Italy, Spain, Greece, Portugal, North Africa and the Middle East since biblical times. However they weren't dining on corned beef, blintzes, bagels or brisket.

Joyce Goldstein's New Mediterranean Jewish Table, with over 400 pages, is a virtual encyclopedia of everything you've ever wanted to know about the foods of the Mediterranean.

The recipes celebrate a colourful and delicious mosaic of this cuisine with locally grown, seasonal and unadulterated ingredients. Typical ingredients include cinnamon, nutmeg, cardamom, cumin, almonds, tahini paste, artichokes, tangy olives and preserved lemons.

This is not just a cookbook. It is a delicious food history book. The diverse collection of recipes spans the Mediterranean from southern Europe to North Africa to the Middle East and all points between, offering a comprehensive, authoritative, and accessible guide to the entire region's food. Goldstein also gives the variations that each country add to the recipe.

If you've ever visited any of the Mediterranean countries and longed to be able to prepare the foods you've eaten there at home, this is the book for you. Recipes such as Italian Crispy Fried Artichokes, Moroccan Tagine of Pumpkin and Lentils, Venetian Style Marinated Fish, Chicken and Rice Pilaf Wrapped in Filo, Tunisian Hot-Pepper Condiment, Candied Eggplant (yes, candied eggplant!), or Greek Creamy Cheese–Filled Filo Pastry will have you heading for the kitchen. Admittedly the recipes are not necessarily simple or quick, but they're well worth the raves you'll receive.

Moroccan marinated olives

(Olives Marinees)

- ❑ 1 cups drained brined black or green olives
- ❑ 6 tbsp. chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
- ❑ 6 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
- ❑ 3 cloves garlic, chopped
- ❑ 1 tsp. red pepper flakes, or 2 fresh red chiles, slivered lengthwise
- ❑ ½ tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ ½ cup extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ 3 or 4 thin strips lemon or orange zest, or peel of ½ preserved lemon, homemade or store-bought, rinsed and cut into strips, with some of its juice

Using a meat pounder or the side of a heavy cleaver, crack the olives. Put the olives in a bowl, add water to cover, and let stand for about 1 hour. Drain well, pat dry, and return to the bowl.

Add the parsley, cilantro, garlic, pepper flakes, cumin, oil, lemon juice, and lemon zest and toss well.

Transfer to a jar or other container, cap tightly and refrigerate for 2 days before serving. They will keep for up to 7 days. Serves 6. ■

Veteran Canadian actor stars in black comedy

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Film, stage and television actor Eric Peterson will grace the stage in Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's (HGJTC) presentation of Donald Margulies' The Model Apartment, running May 7 to 29 at Greenwin Theatre in the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

First produced in the '90s in New York, The Model Apartment is a black comedy about two elderly Holocaust survivors, Max and Lola, and their daughter. The action takes place one evening in the early '80s. The couple has purchased a condo sight unseen, and arrive in Florida only to learn there are problems.

The Toronto-based Peterson, who originally hails from Indian Head, Sask., plays Max. He will be joined by Dora Award-winning actor Clare Coulter playing his wife, Lola, Lisa Norton as their daughter, Debbie, and Tony Ofori as Debbie's friend. Tanja Jacobs directs.

"The basic story of The Model Apartment is about Max and Lola... Lola is a survivor of Belsen, and Max survived by hiding in the woods," Peterson says. "They meet after the war, come to New York and have a daughter, Debbie. As the play opens, Max and Lola have come to Florida to their condo. Max is looking forward to a peaceful retirement.

Eric Peterson

> It has been fascinating for me to delve into this story about the Holocaust

"The condo isn't ready, so the management has told them to stay in the display bachelor condo... therefore the title, The Model Apartment. They are very tired, and somewhat depressed and frustrated because their own place isn't ready. They are joined by Debbie, who is in her late 30s – she is obese and mentally challenged in various ways... let's say she's a handful. Later that night, they are joined by a young, black street kid."

Peterson says the play has given him food for much thought. "I am from the goyim. It has been fascinating for me to delve into this story about the Holocaust and the Jewish experience of it. Although I am not Jewish, I have a lot of Jewish friends. The Holocaust is an historic element of Jewish experience.

"The play has a very specific story with specific characters with specific problems. One can indeed extrapolate from that experience – about being parents and what we give to our children, how we aid them and how we screw them up. For a non-Jewish person, there's a lot to get out of the play because universality is only accessible if it is based on specifics... That's my theory. This story is about a specific culture and history – this event called The Holocaust.

"Even if you are a non-religious Jew, this is a history you identify with and know. One of the themes in the play is that trauma becomes a legacy and is passed down. The Holocaust has had direct implications for the children and the children's children of survivors," says the father of two daughters.

He says the challenge for him is to try to understand this and be part of it convincingly and not offend anybody with his portrayal. This is Peterson's first time working with HGJTC, and he says he is glad to be part of it and to perform alongside such a wonderful cast. So far, he says, learning about the Jewish culture and history has been a really rich ride for him.

The 69-year-old actor's career spans more than four decades and includes portrayals of a World War I flying ace in Billy Bishop Goes to War, Jewish lawyer Leon Rabinovich in Street Legal and the grumpy Oscar Leroy in Corner Gas, to name a few. He has received many accolades and awards, including being named a member of the Order of Canada, receiving five Gemini Awards, a Dora Mavor Moore Award, an ACTRA Toronto Award for Excellence and an honorary doctorate from the University of Saskatchewan. ■

New documentary gives a voice to Israeli Arabs

Mohammad Ka'abiya, an Israeli Bedouin, gets stopped twice in under two minutes by Israeli soldiers in Jerusalem.

Igal Hecht

JOSEPH SERGE
jserge@thecjn.ca

In My Home, the latest documentary by Toronto filmmaker Igal Hecht, an Israeli citizen talks about his love for his country. He has served in the Israel Defence Forces and now trains youths from the same background as his to connect with Israel.

The man, Mohammad Ka'abiya, is an Israeli Bedouin, an Arab citizen of Israel. As he puts it in the documentary, "This country is good for every Arab citizen who lives here. We don't have any other country. There is equality here. God bless the occupation."

Ka'abiya is one of the Arab Israelis interviewed in My Home who talk about what Israel means to them. And contrary to many people's expectations, the majority of Israel's minority love living in Israel.

"We interviewed a variety of people with a variety of opinions," Hecht tells me. "Some are Zionists, some aren't," but they all appreciate Israel.

"By giving Israeli minorities a platform, you see what is really happening in Israel. It's not all rosy – anyone who thinks Israel doesn't have racism, is an idiot. Arabs in Israel have complete freedom. It doesn't mean there is no racism, there is," Hecht says.

Ka'abiya himself encounters racism. In one poignant, almost ironic moment in the film, Hecht and his cameraman, Lior Cohen, are following Ka'abiya as he walks down a Jerusalem street with a Jewish woman, shortly after one of the stabbing incidents that had been widely reported late last year.

Suddenly, a group of young soldiers approach Ka'abiya, asking him for ID and questioning him. Ka'abiya is polite, and takes it all in stride. But only moments later, the same group of soldiers approach and harass him again.

"That scene speaks volumes," Hecht says. "He understood the first time why he was stopped. A minute and 12 seconds later he was stopped by the same group. That's where the problem is."

Yet Ka'abiya takes it all in stride. As he says at one point, "We [Bedouin] have been citizens here for 67 years. Isn't it time we felt that we belong?"

Minorities make up 20 per cent of the Israeli population, and the Bedouin are one of four major Arab groups, along with Muslims, Christians and Druze, in this minority.

But, according to this documentary, to most Israelis, they are all collectively "Arabs."

The reason for this, Hecht believes, is that the Israeli media, which dictate the narrative, and Israeli society are lazy.

"It's easier to call them Arabs," Hecht says. "They don't want to think, that's a Muslim, that's a Christian, etc., each with different thoughts, and that maybe Arab culture doesn't impact everything they do. It's easier to think in black and white. There's a thousand shades of grey. Making things black and white is easier for people, but by doing that, you're creating more hatred and racism."

As far as the Israeli media are concerned, Hecht points to one specific scene from this documentary. At one point, they are at a protest in Sakhnin. Unexpectedly, the entire Arab Joint List party show up and the speeches, in Arabic, are full of incitement and hatred against Israel.

"It's a call to arms, a call to bomb people. That's just as horrific and racist as a prime minister saying Arab people are turning out to vote," a reference to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's controversial comments on election day.

Yet, Hecht says, the Israeli media only had a 20-second item on this protest, mostly because, he says, Israeli journalists don't understand Arabic.

He said it was important for him to give a voice to the average Arab. "All you hear on TV is an Arab minister screaming and BDS people, but the average individual is never given a platform. We give the average individual a platform to speak – about how they view Israel and what Israel means to them. And we show Israelis that not every Arab hates Israel, some love Israel."

One of the more interesting people of the four Arabs interviewed for this film is Jonathan Elkhoury, a Lebanese Christian who immigrated with his family after the Israeli withdrawal. Elkhoury is interviewed in his home, discussing with his Jewish roommate why he doesn't like being called an "Arab."

"That was such a surreal scene," Hecht recalls. "You have the Jew telling the Arab, 'You live in an oppressive state,' and him saying, 'No, what are you talking about?' He's a Christian who lived under the oppressive regime of Hezbollah. He's now living in a predominantly Jewish democracy that allows him to celebrate Christmas and walk outside wearing his cross. He doesn't take any of that for granted."

My Home recently premiered in Boston where Hecht won best director at the Global Cinema Film Festival.

The documentary is also being edited for a five-part series that will feature over 30 interviews. ■

My Home has its world broadcast premiere on the Documentary Channel on May 10 at 8 p.m.

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Strong beliefs come to the aid of many seniors

Dr. Michael Gordon

The envelope contained a lovely letter. In this new world of electronic communication, it's uncommon to receive a hand-written card, and even more unlikely that you will get a fully formed letter. So this was a welcome surprise.

It was a very heartfelt letter written by a daughter who visited me with her father over a number of years along with her mother, as her father gradually declined into a greater degree of dementia.

At the beginning, the reason they sought assessment was to try to define what was going on and try to give his condition a "working label" they could deal with. At that time, as is often the case, he denied any problem. He was still very active in the Jehovah's Witnesses church and was still actively proselytizing door to door – which according to what I gathered from his family, he did with enormous respect and grace.

As his cognition declined despite symptomatic treatments and he faced the usual traumas such as reporting his condition to the Ministry of Transport, which removed his driving licence, the focus of discussions with the family, with him in attendance, was always on future plans and preparation for the further decline that ultimately would lead to the end stages of dementia. He would often participate at some level, but the family carried the conversation.

Then he was accepted, after a long process, at a suitable long-term care facility and it became clear that the whole trajectory of their life together would be changing. That event prompted the letter I received. At my final visit with the man and his family, he clearly was not involved in what was going on, but I did get a chance to thank him for teaching me about his religious movement and tell him how much I learned from him. That was something he clearly was able to understand, and with a smile, he thanked me again for seeing him. And that was our final goodbye, although I asked the family to let me how he acclimatized to his new milieu.

Even though his belief system was alien from mine and those of most of the people I care for, the important thing for me was how much emotional, intellectual and spiritual support it provided for him. Without getting into the complexities of the implications of belief systems and religion, I want to emphasize that for many of the older people I see clinically, having a belief-system – usually with one of the recognized religions – seems to matter a great deal in how they deal with the challenges of what are often daunting illnesses.

Much of my practice is with ambulatory geriatrics, where the majority of patients come to me with multiple medical problems in which cognitive impairment plays a major role. The other part of my clinical activity is on the palliative care unit at Baycrest, where patients are at various stages of the end of life process with, for example, malignancy, late end-stage heart failure and dementia.

For many, it becomes clear after admission how much they seek some religious or spiritual support to help them through this very difficult part of life. We have the assistance of religious leaders, consultants from virtually all the religions in the city including, as expected, rabbinical support with which we are fortunately well-endowed. A good part of our support comes through the work of chaplains who, whatever their own belief associations, are able to minister in a general spiritual way to anyone who wishes to participate.

The important principle is that for many, and for seniors in particular, belief in a deity matters – especially during the crises of life and at the end – and it may provide a meaning and important succour that nothing else can match. We must understand this in order to provide the best of care in all domains. ■

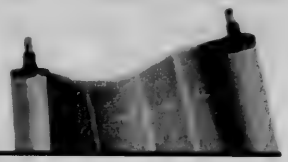
Acharei Mot | Leviticus 16:1-18:30



Yacov Fruchter wonders how to make theological sense of the Holocaust
Rabbi Shalom Spira considers an arcane law concerning separate seating at shul
Rachael Turkienicz explains why the mundane aspects of life are important in Judaism

Yacov Fruchter

After the death of Aaron's eldest sons as they were consumed by God's fire, Acharei Mot describes how to purify and maintain the sanctity of the Sanctuary in the Mishkan. This was no small task for Aaron and no insignificant commandment. Aaron and future generations of high priests are charged with maintaining the sanctity of the place where his sons died.

Even after experiencing Sinai, and perhaps especially because God must have seemed so close to him then, could anyone question Aaron if he turned to Moses and said, "Sorry brother – I'm out! Find a new kohen gadol." Instead, Aaron took his brief moment to mourn his sons, and then went on helping his brother lead the Children of Israel.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg explains in his book The Jewish Way that following the Holocaust, no survivor and no Jew could be blamed for turning away from a religious life and even from God entirely. He argues that one way of making theological sense of the Holocaust is that God broke His side of the Covenant with the Jewish People and from that point on, the Covenant was a voluntary one.

He notes that, remarkably, most did not turn away from Judaism, but took on more power in the partnership between God and the Jewish People. We were no longer going to wait for God to act on our behalf, and neither would we naively rely on our governments.

Since the Holocaust, Jews in the Diaspora have worked to create a safer and more stable environment by building well-organized Jewish communities and institutions, establishing coalitions with others and working to defend the rights of all people.

Ultimately, the greatest demonstration of Jewish self-determination was the establishment of the State of Israel. Like Aaron, at a moment of great pain, the Jews chose to keep the flame of the Jewish People alive by establishing a spiritual centre for their people. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And in their statutes you shall not walk" (Leviticus 18:3). Rambam, Hilchot Avodat Kochavim, 11:1, elucidates this as a prohibition against Jews building an assembly hall that culturally emulates Noahide practice. Accordingly, Rabbi Yosef Zvi Dushinsky, Teshuvot Maharitz Dushinsky, 1:9, concludes that Leviticus, 18:3 represents a mitzvah for separate synagogue seating.

Rabbi Yitzchak Zilberstein in Chashukei Chemed al Mesechet Sukkah (52a), raises a tangential hypothetical question. Occasionally, Jews must flee to an air raid shelter where no partition is available. Can they nevertheless recite Psalms in communal unison?

Rabbi Zilberstein answers affirmatively based on Mordechai to Shabbat, no. 311, who posits an exception to the rabbinic Sabbath interdiction against constructing a mechitzah ha-materet (a temporary partition that orchestrates a legal permission, such as the third wall of a sukkah). Mordechai rules that one may interpose a curtain between ladies and gentlemen during a Sabbath lecture. Rabbi Zilberstein infers that a synagogue partition is a fungible requirement, so long as there is an empty spatial buffer.

However, others understand Mordechai quite differently. Rabbi Yehudah Herzl Henkin, Teshuvot Bnei Vanim, 1:1, interprets Mordechai to refer specifically to a lecture, where the partition represents an elective manifestation of piety, but not to communal prayer. Alternatively, Rabbi Eliezer Yehudah Waldenberg, Teshuvot Tzitz Eliezer, 7:8, concedes that Mordechai also addresses communal prayer, but claims that the synagogue partition exceeds the height of a sukkah wall, and so is not designated a mechitzah ha-materet, despite its obligatory nature.

According to either of the latter two stringent readings, the shelter-bound Jews in question must pray individually rather than communally. However whether or not this interpretation would also affect the recitation of Psalms is a question that requires further investigation. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

This week's Torah reading, Acharei Mot, boggles our minds with nuances of life and death, sin and atonement and trying to understand the goat that is spared and the goat that turns into what we know as the scapegoat. It is important that the sacrificial rituals described are performed to the letter of the law. Shpritz only so many drops of blood, nothing more, and have the fat vapourize at precisely the right time. Just when you're about to throw your hands up in surrender, and just when the concepts and instructions have you ready to walk away, the Torah says two words that changes our view on everything: v'chai bahem – you shall live by them.

When referring to the commandments, the Torah concludes by saying "and you shall live by them" to which the Talmud adds, "and not die by them." We are to use all these commandments, all these details and nuances to enhance our lives and not diminish them. We are to suspend all but three of the commandments to secure life. We must never murder, worship other gods or commit a sexual crime. Only those three must be preserved in life and death situations.

In fact, by wording it the way the Torah does, living life is now seen as one of the commandments itself. We are to live life as a commandment. Sometimes it is an act of loving kindness, sometimes it is a ritual, while other times it is routine. Our life is a celebration of spirituality and God, yet it is also mundane and banal. It is the reflection of every commandment we learn and every commandment that confounds us.

In this week's portion, we are commanded to live our lives, in the nuance of its simplicity and the glory of its sophistication. ■

Rabbi Sally Priesand: 'I just wanted to be a rabbi'

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Sally J. Priesand, North America's first female rabbi, who was ordained in 1972 by Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, will be the scholar in residence at Temple Kol Ami on May 6-7.

Rabbi Priesand, who served as spiritual leader of the Monmouth Reform Temple in New Jersey from 1981 until her retirement in 2006, plans to address the Thornhill, Ont., congregation three times. The lectures are titled "Reflections on My Life as a Rabbi," "Why I Am a Reform Jew," and "Remembering Rabbi Regina Jonas," the first female rabbi who was ordained in Germany in 1935 before dying in the Holocaust.

Rabbi Priesand spoke to The CJN in advance of her visit about pursuing her dream and how Jewish feminism has evolved.

Having paved the way for hundreds of other women who have since followed in your footsteps, in the 44 years since you were ordained, how have things evolved for women who dream of becoming Jewish leaders?

Things have definitely evolved. I'll talk about some of the things we've learned and how Jewish feminism has impacted the Jewish community. I'm happy to say that in the Reform movement, there are more than 700 female rabbis, and I would say, probably, in all of Judaism, all the movements, there are well over 1,000 throughout the world.

When I was in rabbinical school, there were 35 men in my class and me. I had no mentors per se, and I had no female mentors, so I had no role models, and that has changed drastically today. I think that's very positive.

Did you ever imagine at that time, having faced the challenges of being the only woman seeking ordination, that you'd see the day when Reform female rabbis barely raise an eyebrow anymore?

Well, I guess the honest answer is no. I didn't become a rabbi because I was trying to champion women's rights or be a pioneer or any of those things. I just wanted to be a rabbi. And I wanted to be a congregational rabbi, which I spent my whole career doing, but I'm a very lucky person, because my dream got to be fulfilled. However, I will say that for many years, I was quite conscious of the fact that people judged the idea of women in the rabbinate by me. So many of the decisions I made in my life, I made for what was best for women in the rabbinate, not necessarily for what was best for me. I did feel that responsibility. I think it comes with being the first, and I have always tried, after opening the door, to keep the door open for others to follow me.

Is the current controversy with Orthodox female rabbis and the Rabbinical Council of America's resolutions against them similar to what you faced more than four decades ago?

In coming to know Rabba Sara Hurwitz, [the first female modern Orthodox rabba, ordained in 2009,] who is really at the centre of all of that, I realize that much of what she is going through, I went through. I think one of the big differences today is that she has a lot of supporters from every movement of Judaism, and I really feel it is incumbent upon us, in particular Jewish women, to support her in her efforts. And I very much admire her and all she has accomplished. I'm pleased she is the dean of Yeshivat Maharat, and I was very honoured and pleased to attend their first graduation ceremony a few years ago. Every year since then, they have ordained three or four or five women in the modern Orthodox tradition, and what is so exciting about it is they all have jobs in the modern Orthodox tradition. Some of them are in Canada, I believe. I think that's very positive.

Rabbi Sally Priesand

When it comes to feminism, there has to be two kinds of people. There have to be the kind of people who are willing to be out there – and right now I'm thinking about the early days of feminism – who are out there protesting and speaking out, etc., but then there also has to be women who are willing to do whatever it is they are protesting about.

So in my role, I've always considered myself to be a feminist, which means to me simply that every person has the right to become all that he or she is capable of becoming. In the beginning, there are probably quotes from me, way back when, that didn't necessarily reflect that I was a feminist, but with that definition, I've always been a feminist. I focused my energy and attention on becoming a rabbi, not speaking about it. You need to have both.

What are your thoughts on work done by the Women of the Wall to force a recent decision by the Israeli cabinet to designate a prayer section at the Western Wall for non-Orthodox streams of Judaism, and for women who choose to pray with tfillin, prayer shawls and the Torah?

I have two problems with the decision. First, I do not consider separate to be equal, and secondly, I'm not convinced that they are actually going to move forward with the space. In the separate-but-equal part, I worry a little that our Orthodox sisters may feel abandoned by us, and secondly, I'll believe it when the government does what it says. I'll believe it when I see it.

Do you have a message for women who wish to pursue ordination, or to those who feel threatened by the idea of women taking on Jewish leadership roles?

Try it. You'll like it.

I spent the year before I was ordained and the year after travelling the country, speaking in various locations in order for people to see me – to see that I was human and that it really wasn't that crazy. From my own personal experience, I have found that once people experience it, they are quite willing to accept it.

I suspect that some people are looking for a father figure, I guess. Today, I don't honestly know, because women are making gains in every other area. I'm watching [U.S. Democratic presidential hopeful] Hillary Clinton, and I very much support her, but I see a lot of things that happen to her that would never happen if she were a man. I can empathize with her so much. We just have to keep trying to break through the barriers, and we will continue to make progress. ■

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

Were you happy with the amount of income tax you paid for last year?

There is no limit to the amount of income tax that the government will accept from you.
Higher tax bracket payers will pay even more next year!

However, there are ways to pay less tax, legally, of course!

We can show you how to use dividend income or capital gains, which are taxed at a lower rate than interest income, or Return of Capital products, which incur little or no tax, to help you reduce the amount of tax you must pay.

Reparations – from the shtetls to urban America

Backstory

DAVID WEINFELD

My father and I recognized the house immediately. We had seen it many times before in that black-and-white photograph, enlarged and framed, hanging in our house in Montreal. In that picture, my grandfather, Arnold Weinfeld, stood with his sister Gisella and his parents, Moshe and Brauna, by the front steps. It was the same spot where my father and I stood now.

That was in 2011. We went to Budaniv, Ukraine – formerly Budzanov, Poland – in search of memories and ghosts. Instead we found a home filled with people. Two Ukrainian families lived in the house where my grandfather grew up. I don't know how they got there. The Weinfelds never sold that house. The children made it out of eastern Europe; Gisella and her brother Abraham before the war, my grandfather Arnold after. Moshe and Brauna were not so lucky.

Nazis or their collaborators murdered all eight of my great-grandparents. My four grandparents were Holocaust survivors, but my upbringing was pleasant. I lived in a comfortable middle-class home filled with books, in a loving family with two parents with doctorates and two caring sisters. I went to good schools, took vacations to Florida and Israel, played street hockey in a safe neighbourhood, and benefited from the relatively robust Canadian welfare state.

But when I stood in front of that house in Budaniv, I felt the weight of history. "Doesn't the house belong to us? Aren't we, the descendants of Moshe and Brauna Weinfeld, somehow entitled to it? Did our slaughtered ancestors not deserve some measure of justice?" I asked my father.

We quickly realized that returning the house to our possession would not accomplish very much. We were not going to summer in western Ukraine, in a town with no running water. Nor did we want to displace the current occupants without compensation. Apparently, the present owner was trying to sell it, and only half-jokingly we discussed buying the house and converting it into some sort of shtetl museum. We still might do that.

Before encountering the house, I didn't think much about reparations. My only other major association with the concept was the summer of 2001, when I visited Berlin with a Jewish friend. We entered a chocolate shop, where there was a table with free samples. We each took one. Then I thought, "They owe me more than one!" I took as many as I could fit in my fists and shoved them into my bag. Reparations!

I thought about this again as the debate over reparations for African-American victims of slavery, Jim Crow segregation, and other forms of racial discrimination returned to the media. Reparations in the form of targeted payments to individuals and communities will not by themselves solve the problems of black America. Massive social democratic reform, expansion of the welfare state, increased gun control, drug legalization, and other universal political, legal, and economic measures will be required to accelerate the healing process. Nonetheless, an official reparations program can and will have tremendous psychological value for the African-American community.

Jews who lived far from the horrors of the Holocaust, or far after, benefited psychologically from reparations payments made to their co-religionists. Reparations reinforced the German admission of guilt. They brought a small degree of closure to a wound that would never entirely heal. For future generations, the Holocaust became something we would never forget, but also something we would not let haunt us. The official recognition of our suffering will never make up for the individual lives lost and scarred, but it has eased our collective pain. That sentiment holds true from the graveyards of eastern Europe to the battered ghettos of urban America.

In Budaniv, there is an old Jewish cemetery, with most of the tombstones knocked down, moss growing over them. You can still make out some of the Hebrew writing, including a common epitaph, the opening line to the Book of Job, which described the titular character as "a man perfect and upright." Job loses his family and suffers greatly, only to be blessed with a new family in the end.

It does not make up for the earlier tragedy. It is partial justice, the only kind available in an imperfect world. ■

WHY BE JEWISH?

Edgar Bronfman's clarion call to a generation of secular, disaffected and unaffiliated Jews.

"This book is Edgar Bronfman's parting gift to his people—his legendary devotion in a new form. As he was with his deeds, so he is with his words: a prince of Jewish commitment." —LEON WIESELTIER

"I was blown away by the beauty of this book."
—BRUCE FEILER, NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR OF WALKING THE BIBLE AND ABRAHAM

"Edgar Bronfman...rightly points out that Judaism can be a powerful way to access the feeling of wonder about the universe, even for the most secular of us." —A. J. JACOBS

Throughout WHY BE JEWISH?, Edgar states that we must be the change we want to see in the world. And we cannot use guilt, threats, or even prayer to keep Judaism alive. We must make the case for why Judaism is worth preserving in our own time, in our own lives.

WHY BE JEWISH? is Edgar's strongest and most beautiful articulation of what it means to pursue this work. Throughout its pages, he pushes us to help repair our troubled world, armed with the strength, wisdom, and optimism of our Jewish tradition. Edgar Bronfman's impact on the Jewish world is beyond belief, and I am confident his message will reverberate for generations to come.

Canadian K-tel founder dies, and Little Steven tells off boycotters

But wait... there's no more...

Philip Kives, a Canadian marketing prodigy whose firm K-tel International pioneered the business of "as-seen-on-TV" infomercials, died April 27 in Winnipeg at age 87. The son of eastern European immigrants who settled in a Jewish agricultural colony in Saskatchewan, Kives launched what became K-tel in 1962. For decades, it saturated North American airwaves with ads for gadgets such as the Veg-O-Matic, the Miracle Brush, and the Bonsai Blade. K-tel also recorded and sold compilation music albums such as 25 Polka Greats and the Hooked on Classics series, which featured disco versions of Mozart, Beethoven and Bach. K-Tel went bankrupt in 1984, but a successor company continues to license and sell its music library.

words last week in a series of tweets in which he called Israel boycotters "politically ignorant obnoxious idiots" and urged one to "go f— yourself." Springsteen and his band have come under fire from supporters of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement amid rumours they'll play Tel Aviv this summer. The Boss and other band members have been assailed before on Twitter, but Van Zandt's May 2 row with critics grew out of an exchange with a fan who was upset the band had cancelled a show in North Carolina to boycott the state's new anti-transgender bathroom law. That led another fan to wonder why the band won't boycott Israel as well.

Leave me alone, God!

An Israeli man petitioned the Haifa Magistrate's Court last week for a restraining order against God, claiming the Almighty has been particularly unkind to him. The resident of the northern port city represented himself in court. God apparently chose not to attend the proceedings, though it's possible the Omnipresent was indeed there and chose to stay silent. The man argued that God had shown a negative attitude toward him over a three-year period. Judge Ahsan Canaan called the request ludicrous and said the applicant needed psychiatric help. ■

Not a subject for debate

Jonathan Kay engages in intellectual jousting with his mother, Barbara Kay, on an issue that is far too serious to be viewed as a proposition to be argued in some debate society ("Kay vs. Kay," April 21).

The words he uses to contend that Jews who stand in line with the enemies of Israel are not malicious or dangerous do not diminish the anxiety that many of us feel for the future of our children, grandchildren and our brothers and sisters in Israel.

He is either too naive or too wishfully hopeful that the crescendo of the anti-Semitic symphony we are hearing will not lead to the same tragic consequences which have plagued the Jewish People. The fact that Jews are performers in this orchestra betrays a monumental historical amnesia.

The state of the Jewish family

I enjoyed reading Marilyn Lazar's "Modern seder raises more than four questions," (April 21).

It was a beautifully written piece, except for one thing: her underlying thesis. Is the familial dismemberment plaguing the modern Jewish family, mirroring the faltering footsteps of the non-Jewish world, a light unto that world or a reflection of its failings? Is it something we should "lovingly" embrace or honestly question?

The more we embrace, the less true, I suggest, we are to ourselves and the less demanding we become of ourselves.

When familial disarray is made the new family norm, Jewish decline becomes a self-realizing and self-justifying social phenomenon. Broken families become "blended" families. Disarray equals diversity, conflict pretends to be harmony, and judgment is confused with the judgmental. Self-deception is seductive and self-soothing.

A warning for parents

Kudos to Lauren Kramer "We owe it to our kids to expose sexual predators," (April 28).

As a high school student, I used to go to Hillel hoping to attract a Jewish boyfriend. I used the library during these visits.

Once the rabbi came into the library, shut the door and asked me to sit beside him. He then proceeded to rub my legs. I was shocked and probably my face showed it. He said," I won't hurt you dear."

Just then laughing voices coming up the stairs became audible. The rabbi opened the door.

My friend wanted me to report it. I did not want to, envisioning having to meet with staff and the rabbi, and I did not want to go through the trouble. I told my friend not to report it. I felt thankful that the rabbi's approach was limited to a touch.

I am writing to warn parents to discuss this possibility with both their sons and their daughters. Just because someone holds an official position in Judaism, or any other religion, is no guarantee they won't be an abuser.

No haven in Israel

Maya Fennig's op-ed is remarkable for its insight, clarity and understanding of Jewish values and social justice ("Let's remember Israel's refugees from Sudan and Eritrea," April 28).

It's a breath of fresh air amid the foul manoeuverings of the Israeli government against the African asylum seekers in Israel. They are refugee claimants under international law. Their lives are being made intolerable by bigoted politicians fomenting vicious public animosity against them, while Israel incarcerates them as "infiltrators" instead of hearing their cases in a compassionate and timely manner.

Canadian immigration law permits a group of people to sponsor a refugee or refugee family and to assist with their integration into Canadian society. We are proud that Canada has this unique path for refugees to come here. As Jews, we are ashamed that Israel, calling itself a "Jewish state," denies one of the most fundamental characteristics of Judaism and menschlichkeit.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Keeping ties with Israel strong

Rabbis and synagogues have a role to play in connecting their communities with the Jewish state, and increasing the depth of that engagement

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: A wise senior rabbi once told me that when hiring a new rabbi, a congregation should ask the candidate if he or she plans, at some point in the future, on making aliyah to Israel. If the candidate does not aspire to live in Israel, the rabbi told me, then the candidate is unfit to lead a congregation of Diaspora Jews. While this position might seem extreme to some, the underlying point resonates with me. Even as our feet are firmly planted in Canada, our hearts yearn for Israel.

This message, however, becomes increasingly challenging to convey as the Jewish community's attitude to Israel becomes more complex. We see that more and more North American Jews are feeling alienated from Israel, and as the community becomes less observant and weaker in Jewish identity, support for Israel inevitably suffers.

I see that as a core problem and a challenge to our communal values. What, if anything, can we do to ensure that identifying with Israel remains a central part of our community's identity?

Rabbi Cutler: It is imperative for all Diaspora synagogues to build relationships between its constituents and the land, people and State of Israel.

I am proud to say that my shul is highly Israel-engaged. For the last eight years, we have participated in the shinshinim program, in which two post-high school Israelis spend a year with our community. Israel is addressed from the bimah and visited on synagogue trips. The more points we can connect with Israel, the more likely the relationship will grow strong.

It's important to note that all of the above is independent of politics. While I hold personal political leanings, and as appropriate I do share them, I don't see my objective as getting others to agree with me. Rather, I think it is the role of the rabbi to engage people with Israel and then increase the depth of that connection.

Rabbi Scheier: I, too, am blessed to serve a congregation with a long history of supporting, visiting and championing Israel. I am proud that our love for Israel is a central part of my community's identity. And I agree with your approach to Israeli politics, in terms of engaging people in the Israel conversation.

However, I return to my original question about maintaining Israel's relevance to the Jewish People, and allow me to ask the question differently. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks writes about the difference between history and memory. He writes that history is "his story" – the story of another – while memory is "my story." The Jewish approach requires us to engage history as personal memory. For those of us born after the struggles and wonders of the Jewish State's birth, we are challenged to translate Israel's history into shared memory.

How do we turn the identity-forming experiences of a Zionist creation of a state into a memory that will sustain a new generation of Israel supporters?

Rabbi Cutler: With respect, I don't believe you're asking the right question.

Certainly, the conversion of history into memory has enabled the Jewish People to forge deep bonds with one another and with the past. Israel, though, is not something that was. Israel is something that is. Our task as community leaders is to connect our communities with Israel and, in so doing, ensure that Israel continues to be.

But self-preservation cannot be an end unto itself. As the homeland of the Jewish People, the State of Israel must intentionally foster a vibrant contemporary Jewish life. It is not only a place for Jews to go to be safe. It is a place where Judaism, in all of its manifestations, should thrive. And despite its difficult neighbourhood, Israel must exemplify Jewish values in the international arena and through its domestic policies.

Connection grows from the heart, not the head. At the same time, as educational institutions, our synagogues must create frameworks wherein all Jews – young and old, hardened Zionists and disenchanted community members – can discuss Israel in a values-based, Jewish-sources-rich, passionate and respectful conversation. Such a framework engages all Jews with Israel. That conversation also builds relationships between our community here and the land, people and state over there. ■

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, gazing back and looking forward

Israel's 68th year will be remembered first and foremost for the wave of stabbing attacks that terrorized the Jewish state from October 2015 through March of this year.

When the so-called "knife intifadah" began, Israelis were at first unsure how to respond, given that there appeared to be no way of anticipating when or where the next assault might take place. Faced with an unpredictable terror, Israel's security and military establishment initially struggled before developing a working solution to the violence, but it now appears the attacks have been effectively quelled. Once again, Israel's enemies have been thwarted.

But just when the knife attacks ended, a familiar foe returned to the fore, as the Israel Defence Forces uncovered two Hamas-erected tunnels stretching from Gaza into Israel. And while Israeli forces searched for more tunnels last week, Hamas rained mortars across the Gaza border into Israel.

The renewed violence was a stark reminder of the 2014 war that saw Hamas employ a sophisticated network of tunnels to wage attacks inside Israel and launch an unprecedented rocket barrage that forced Israelis into bomb shelters and led to a tragic loss of life on both sides. Most analysts seem to agree Hamas is in no position to start a new round of fighting right now, but there is always the risk that border skirmishes could escalate into something much more dangerous.

The knife attacks and the still-fresh memories of the 2014 war were certainly top-of-mind for Diaspora Jews during the past 12 months, too, but the year also saw a noteworthy evolution in intra-Jewish debate about Israel. Some voices in the Jewish community began to wonder out loud whether Israel could in fact be a home for the Jewish People and a democracy at the same time, and even sought to pressure the Israeli government publicly. This led to questions about the critics' motivations and dedication to the Jewish state. Online conversations devolved into personal attacks, name-calling and vilification.

It's hard to see how any of that benefits the Jewish community, let alone Israel. And it certainly contradicts our people's ethos of refined debate. With that in mind, we mark Yom Ha'atzmaut in this week's CJN with two essays on the topic of civil discourse.

Michael Diamond challenges Jewish community leaders "to demonstrate the humility that comes from recognizing that the 'truth' is seldom static, that answers constantly evolve and that we can be the best we can be only if we are open to listen to others" (see page 47). And Rabbi Chaim Strauchler extends the Passover parable of the Four Sons to Yom Ha'atzmaut, arguing that "every generation must… confront the challenges of Jewish nationhood in its day" (see page 7).

As we mark the beginning of a new year in Israel, we hope for its continued success, for peace and understanding, and for the cessation of terror and violence. In the Diaspora, we could also challenge ourselves to be more courteous and open in our conversations during the Jewish state's 69th year. If we can do so, we might be able to look back with more optimism and less trepidation when Yom Ha'atzmaut comes around again. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

The Four Sons of Yom Ha'atzmaut

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

During Passover, a child shared with me a powerful insight about the "Four Sons." She said that the four sons aren't four different people – rather, all of us can, at times, become each of these children. We all have a bit of the chacham (wise), rasha (evil), tam (simple) and she'eino yodea l'shol (unquestioning) within us.

This insight reminded me of the 15th-century Spanish commentator Rabbi Don Isaac Abarbanel, who explained that the rasha and chacham have the same intellect. The lesson is that the very same tools can be used for good or ill. The chacham uses his knowledge to commit himself to tradition, the rasha uses his brainpower to flee from our community.

Extending Abarbanel's idea, we can look at the four sons along two axes. There is the axis of positive or negative disposition and the axis of intellectual commitment. The chacham has both intellect and goodness. The rasha has intellect but no goodness. The tam has goodness but no intellect. The sheino yodea l'shol lacks both intellect and goodness. This four sons graph can help us understand many problems. Intellect is not enough to solve problems – good motivation is just as important. But while goodness is necessary, it is insufficient. If you want to do great things, you will need talents of the mind and the body.

Oftentimes, we school our children along the axis of intellect and talent. Yet, the world of moral improvement – the distance that separates the chacham from the rasha – is ignored. The truth is that we must seek not just to raise talented and successful children, we must raise moral and good adults. We must judge our own lives not just by our physical and material accomplishments, but also by our character development and moral virtues. The rasha thinks only about what is written in his resume; the chacham thinks also about what will be said in his eulogy.

Israelis, young and old, enjoy the fireworks display at a Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration. If we teach our children to invest their time in Israel, they will come to develop deeper connections to it, writes Rabbi Chaim Strauchler. FLASH 90 PHOTO

While we generally think of the four sons as being specific to Passover, the lesson that each of our children thinks in unique ways is relevant year round. This year, the ever-hot debate about what it means to be pro-Israel in Canada makes speaking about the four sons especially important on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The four sons graph can help us understand our relationship to the State of Israel. During its early years, we, as North American Jews, could support the state of Israel as a tam, rallying behind Israel with the simple faith that the Jewish state was good and its enemies bad. This unflinching and often unsophisticated support united our community. We loved to hear over and over again about the mighty arm of the Israel Defence Forces and its moral perfection.

But now a new child has been born who has heard other stories about Israel. This child is sophisticated and smart, and finds simple arguments about moral perfection off-putting. She asks, "Why should I support a state in which Arabs are second-class citizens, where Ashkenazim hate Sephardim, where the ultra-Orthodox avoid serving the state, and where the rabbinate controls issues of Jewish status?"

She goes to university and joins the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement. "Your state is illegitimate," she says to the community from which she was born.

This child looks at what is wrong with the State of Israel, and asks, "What is all of this to you?"

And the reality is: this child is a growing part of our community. Yet, as problematic as this child's statements and opinions may be, at least she is engaged in questioning. She is a part of the Jewish quest for truth.

Meanwhile, this child has a sibling who does not care about the story of Jewish destiny and Israel, at all. She is not interested in visiting Israel or reading about the Jewish state. Questions of Jewish identity and survival are irrelevant. She won't even waste her time to ask the question, "Why should a small country thousands of miles away concern me?"

That leaves one last child: the chacham. Who is the chacham? She is both smart and committed to Israel, but her commitment is not simplistic. She recognizes that Israel is composed of human beings who make mistakes. She understands that Israel has police officers for a reason – there are criminals in Israel like in any other state. There are criminals on the streets and in business offices, and sometimes even in army uniforms. Yet, she knows that with all its faults Israel is our greatest hope, and that Israel's foundations are built upon principles of nationhood that are as legitimate as those of any other state.

The lesson here is that we cannot love Israel if we do not know Israel. We often speak about the centrality of Jewish education. Now, we must also speak about the importance of Israel education. If we teach our children to invest their time and their resources in Israel, they will come to develop deeper connections to it.

Jewish nationalism began around seder tables in Egypt, thousands of years ago. Every generation must sit at its own seder table and confront the challenges of Jewish nationhood in its day. The Zionism that we received from our parents was simple and wholesome, but the Zionism that we pass on to our children must be sophisticated and noble. ■

Let's honour Israel by calling out irrational hatred

Gil Troy

As Israel celebrates its 68th birthday, too many enemies still regret its birth, and desire its death. The fight against Israel all too often transcends rational discussion about historical facts or current events. Israel-bashing has become an industry and an identity.

On campus, Israeli Apartheid Weeks and boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) resolutions pop up regularly and repeatedly, no matter how few students might be interested. A loud minority pushes this anti-Israel crusade fanatically. And despite the anti-Israel movement's many failures on campuses, more and more outsiders speak about "campuses" as being not just anti-Israel, but anti-Semitic.

Modern anti-Zionism is anti-Semitic because of its disproportionate targeting of one country, Israel, the only Jewish state. Modern anti-Zionism is anti-Semitic because its anti-Israel hysteria echoes traditional anti-Jewish hysteria, with extreme accusations about Jewish power, Jewish evil and innocent, Jesus-like Palestinian victims, with their suffering exaggerated and any responsibility Palestinians might have for the conflict excused. And, less abstractly, modern anti-Zionism is anti-Semitic because when campuses erupt with Israeli Apartheid Weeks and BDS fights, the bullying, demonization, and slander often bubbles over into harassment of Jews on campus – and even occasional violence.

It's easy to despair amid this irrational, seemingly unstoppable hatred. But Israel's triumphal story teaches that individuals can change history. Zionism launched a revolution against far more lethal forms of Jew hatred and far more paralyzing forms of Jewish despondency.

To honour this Israel Independence Day, Jews and non-Jews, especially on campus, should stand up and say "enough." At minimum, students, professors and alumni should start signing letters and petitions denouncing the anti-Israel obsession on campus and championing academic freedom.

This year at McGill University, anti-Israel boycott forces launched a third attempt in 18 months to pass a pro-BDS resolution. After the motion passed in student council, but failed an online ratification vote, McGill principal Suzanne Fortier took a stand. Defending "academic freedom, equity, inclusiveness and the exchange of views and ideas in responsible, open discourse," she issued a statement affirming "the core principles of McGill" and reminding everyone that McGill's "mission" remains "to advance learning and create and disseminate knowledge by offering the best possible education, by carrying out research and scholarly activities judged to be excellent by the highest international standards, and by providing service to society."

Unfortunately, 43 professors denounced Fortier's support of academic freedom. Surprisingly – because McGill's faculty tends to be apolitical – 158 professors then responded with our own letter supporting the principal's "courageous stance." The letter proclaimed: "Boycotts and intellectual bullying have no place at McGill or at any other institution of higher learning," noting that "in its disproportionate focus on Israel, in its founding declaration, and in many statements by key members of the movement, the BDS movement tries to squelch speech and intimidate those who support Israel's right to exist."

The letter, which I proudly signed and helped circulate, also addressed our students' distress, saying: "We fail when our students don't feel genuinely safe in our university – and the BDS movement has made McGill students feel unsafe, unsupported and unwelcome in their and our academic home."

The only documents so many McGill professors have likely signed simultaneously are tax returns and grading sheets. They have shown colleagues throughout North America what to do. Don't wait for a BDS resolution or a pro-BDS statement from others. This month, celebrate Israel's independence by championing academic freedom. Let's see professors, students, and alumni, left and right, issuing broad denunciations of boycotts and academic bullying. This is not for Israel's sake – Israel will survive. This is a test of our values, our universities, our integrity and our souls. ■

Phoning home from Jerusalem, then and now

Sara Horowitz

A colleague returning from a sabbatical in Jerusalem waxed enthusiastic about phone service in Israel. Everyone, he said, had at least one cellphone, and most homes had Internet phone lines, all at a fraction of Canadian rates. Israel, he said, is phone heaven, and we're light years behind.

You might say the advances in phone technology and phoning habits are one measure of changing economic and social practices, national character and ideas of community. Some phone memories give a sense of that evolution.

When I was a student in Jerusalem, decades before the advent of mobile technology, hardly anyone had landlines. Rates were impossibly high, and wait times for installation were two to three years. Social habits reflected the absence of phones. It was common to pop in to visit people without warning. North America students made "phone dates" to speak to parents thousands of miles away – a specific time we'd wait by a designated public phone, or they'd wait for us to place a call from the post office. Long distance conversations were hurried and breathless.

Public phones required an asimon, a special token roughly the size of a Canadian nickel, shaped like a flat doughnut, with a hole in the centre. The longer the conversation, the more asimonim needed. Many Israeli students knew how to tie a thread through the hole, to hold onto the asimon as it slid down the coin chute. That way, the token wouldn't fully drop, but would register as new as time passed, so that even the lengthiest call would cost only one asimon. The truly adept could tug on the thread just as they replaced the receiver and retrieve the asimon for future calls.

My husband remembers queuing at the only working public phone at his Hebrew University dorm while another student made call after endless call. Finally, the other student finished and deftly yanked the thread to reclaim his token, but his timing was a shade off, and he lost it. Furious, he kicked the phone and broke it.

Several weeks before my husband and I were married, a ringing phone woke me up in the middle of the night. It was Bilal, a merchant whose tiny shop in the Jerusalem's Old City held a dazzling array of stunning fabrics. A Jerusalem friend and colleague had introduced me to Bilal and his wares years earlier, and between rounds of mint tea and Turkish coffee and conversations about family, many of his fabrics found their way to my home in North America.

For our wedding, my husband and I decided on a chupah made of fabric from Jerusalem. I asked my friend to purchase the fabric on my behalf and send it to me. But as it turned out, my emissary and the merchant couldn't agree on the fabric. Hence, the call, on a newly installed, crackly phone, at 3 a.m. (my time). She described her choice, he described his. With today's technology, I would be able to see both fabrics. But we had no such options then, only their descriptions of the colours, patterns and sheen of the two fabrics.

They hung up, and I waited for my "surprise purchase" to arrive. In time for the wedding, I received a package containing two bolts of fabric – one, a wedding gift from my friend and the other a wedding gift from Bilal.

I sometimes think back on that late-night call and to the lines of community drawing together an Israeli Jewish ethnographer of Yiddish culture, an Israeli Palestinian fabric merchant and a sleepy-eyed Jewish woman in faraway galut.

I'm not nostalgic for the technologies of yesteryear. The rapid changes in Israeli phone culture are less precious to me than the tightness of social networks that operate without, through or despite technology. ■

The state of Canada-Israel relations on Yom Ha'atzmaut

Michael Taube

May 12 is Yom Ha'atzmaut, or Israeli Independence Day. It's traditionally held on the fifth day of Iyar, although it can be moved forward or back a few days.

I don't have any personal tales or words of wisdom to pass on. I've never celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut, and I've never visited Israel.

Even so, I would assume some CJN readers have travelled to Israel to be a part of this important national day. If not, perhaps they've celebrated at home, a friend's house, restaurant, synagogue, grand hall, and so on.

The federal Liberals, like most other governments in democratic societies, will likely mark the occasion with a press release. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his MPs may also opt to attend one of the functions held in various Canadian cities.

I can't speak for the Liberal government, since I have nothing to do with it. But I can provide some insights into the previous Tory government's views about the commemoration of Israel's Declaration of Independence.

Former prime minister Stephen Harper, my old friend and boss, has always held Canadian Jews in the highest regard. I, and many others, have written about what this community meant (and still means) to him. His admiration has always been real, genuine, principled and deeply personal. Anyone who thinks otherwise is dead wrong.

Harper holds a similar position about Israel.

In his Jan. 20, 2014, speech to the Knesset, he said the friendship between our two nations "is rooted in history, nourished by shared values, and it is intentionally reinforced at the highest levels of commerce and government as an outward expression of strongly held inner convictions."

Moreover, he's always regarded Israel as a "beacon of light" in a part of the world where, I think it's fair to say, darkness regularly needs to be combated.

In terms of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Harper recognized the importance of this national day (as he did with other days and celebrations for different countries). He knew that many Canadians, Jewish and non-Jewish, wanted to take part in these celebrations, and he was pleased that our country showed solidarity with Israel.

The Tory government's 2010 press release has always struck me as the perfect template to honour this national day. In particular, these two paragraphs truly stand out:

"The creation of the State of Israel is a testament to the triumph of faith and perseverance over tragedy and adversity. Israel is an enduring symbol for the world and a source of great inspiration. The courage, resilience and determination that built this formidable, democratic nation continue to hearten Jewish communities around the globe.

"This proud celebration affords us the opportunity to reflect on the events that forged Israel's history, as well as the shared history and values between our two great nations. We count ourselves among Israel's closest friends and allies. Since its founding in 1948, Canada has supported Israel and its right to live in peace and security with its neighbours. We remain strong and steadfast friends."

If you ever wanted to understand what the Harper Tories thought about the State of Israel and Canada-Israel relations, this is the perfect summary. And if you ever wondered why I used to write that Canada was Israel's greatest friend and ally, look no further.

I can't write the same thing about the Trudeau Liberals, however.

While there's no question the current prime minister supports Israel in his own way, he's not nearly as strong a supporter as his predecessor. Early indications – from the federal government's position of being an "honest broker" with Israel to its soft-on-terrorism approach à la U.S. President Barack Obama – also seem to indicate that things won't change anytime soon.

For now, let's be thankful that Israel remains the most important voice for democracy, liberty and freedom in the Middle East. And let's hope that Trudeau's Canada never shifts away from this philosophy. ■

'We'll see you soon, Israel. Lots of love'

Bernie Farber

In July 2003, my wife, Karyn, and I brought our children to Israel for the first time. Gillian was 16, Zachary 14 and Max 10. It was a UJA family mission with a couple of weeks tagged on at the end so that we could spend extra time with family in Givat Ze'ev.

And while there had been a temporary ceasefire proclaimed at the end of June 2003, there were nonetheless suicide bombings and retaliations, as sadly seemed to be the norm. Our children were resistant to going at first, understandably frightened, but mustered their courage, and with high spirits, embarked on a trip we have never forgotten.

I reference our 2003 family journey on this Yom Ha'atzmaut to better personally understand my connection to this tiny strip of land fought over by Jews, Muslims and Christians for over 2,000 years.

It is for me a land of emotional contrasts.

I love the country, but I regularly find many of the policies of the government, especially those that hurt and discriminate against Ethiopian Jews, Eritreans, Arab Israelis and Palestinians in the occupied territories, abhorrent.

I admire the courage of Israeli soldiers and their commitment to the Israel Defence Forces' "purity of arms." I detest those soldiers who, as we have seen only recently, abuse this code and even commit murder against unarmed Palestinians. Yes, I know he was an alleged terrorist, but killing a subdued terrorist just "because" is despicable.

I love the people of Israel but detest those ultra-Orthodox who demand that I adhere to their way of life, those who cursed my wife and children because of the way they dressed, those who through their evil words created a time and place where the assassination of an Israeli prime minister became "halachically" possible.

And most especially, I love the Israel that was founded on the concept of democracy, but I question what it may become if we choose not to work toward peace.

Earlier this month, I agreed to be interviewed by a student who was working on his doctoral thesis at the University of Toronto. His thesis centred around exploring and understanding historical collective memories. He was interviewing activists from both the Arab and the Jewish communities of Canada. We spent quite a few hours together dissecting my personal story. It was at once exhilarating and exhausting. It forced me to confront my feelings, even some long-held demons.

> Israel remains the only safe place for Jews, in view of human history.

At the end, the interviewer asked me the following: despite your reservations about the State of Israel you are still deeply connected and supportive. Why?

This was surprisingly the easiest question for me to answer. For me, Israel remains the only safe place for Jews, in view of human history. As a child of Holocaust survivors, I viscerally understand how fragile we are as a people. Yes, life in Canada is free of the anti-Semitism and genocidal behaviour faced by my parents and grandparents. Nonetheless, with the Shoah as a backdrop for humanity's possibilities, there can never again be no place for Jews to seek refuge.

And yes, we must rage against Israeli policy that leans more and more away from peace. Progressive Jews must find their voice. Through organizations like JSpace, the New Israel Fund and others this is becoming more of a reality.

Two weeks ago, my daughter, Gillian, and son-in-law, Adam, returned from a two-week visit to Israel. On her Facebook site, Gillian wrote: "Israel – your beauty literally astounds me. The gorgeous landscapes, stunning beaches, delicious humus and brave soldiers help make this small country so special. And even though on our very last night in Jerusalem, walking aimlessly around the shuk, we stood just five minutes away from another terrorist attack, it only encourages us to be better people. To love, to explore, to support one another and to not live in fear. So it's not really goodbye, we'll see you soon, Israel. Lots of love."

Jewish groups rush to help Fort McMurray evacuees

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jewish organizations are rallying to help support the tens of thousands of displaced residents of Fort McMurray, Alta., who have been forced to evacuate the area due to a ravaging wildfire.

The Alberta government declared a state of emergency May 4 as a result of the catastrophic fires sweeping through Fort McMurray and the surrounding area, and 90,000 people have been evacuated.

On May 4, the Jewish Federation of Edmonton set up a PayPal account to collect donations for evacuees staying in and around Edmonton.

Community relations director Tal Toubiana said the federation has been publicizing the campaign through its website and on Facebook, in the hope of reaching the city's Jewish community of roughly 5,000 people and the wider Edmonton community.

He said it hasn't been decided where federation will donate the money it raises, though it will likely go to an organization such as the Canadian Red Cross.

Ve'ahavta, a Toronto-based social service organization whose programs include international crisis response, also launched a Fort McMurray relief fund May 4, and Ve'ahavta CEO Avrum Rosensweig said it was able to raise more than $6,000 overnight.

He said Ve'ahavta is in discussions with other organizations to determine how best to allocate the funds, which were mostly donated by people in Toronto.

"There's no map telling you how to give money in a crisis, so we need to figure out who to work with. We've put the word out to the Jewish community in Edmonton and people from Fort McMurray to figure out how best to distribute the money... We're mandated to give it to a larger organization like the Red Cross or United Way," Rosensweig said.

He stressed the Jewish community's responsibility to help those affected by the fire, which may be the worst in Western Canadian history.

"The needs are tremendous in terms of immediate crisis [supplies] like blankets, food and shelter, not all of which are being taken care of by the government and certainly not by insurance companies. It seemed pretty clear to us that there should be a Jewish communal response to this crisis," he said.

IsraAid, an Israel-based non-profit that provides life-saving disaster relief and long-term support in crisis areas all over the world, has also rushed to help, making it the first time the organization will be deploying a team in Canada.

Shachar Zahavi, IsraAid's founding director, told The CJN by phone from Tel Aviv that his group already has a volunteer on the ground in Alberta assessing the situation in evacuation areas set up near Fort McMurray.

"The minute we have a better sense of what's happening, we'll decide how to act," he said, emphasizing that IsraAid will definitely be sending more volunteers over the next few days.

Their aim is to focus first on "psycho-social interventions" to deal with the needs and responses of the evacuees staying in temporary shelters, something he stressed Israel is a leader in. Once the fire stops burning, they'll send a team to help clean up the debris.

"We're usually working in developing countries, although we've been to the United States about 10 times to help with things like hurricanes and tornadoes... We help fill in the gaps [of existing relief work]... Often, in disaster areas, many volunteers will come help for a week or so but then need to go back to work. But we come specially and we stay for two or three weeks, so that's an advantage other groups don't have," he said.

Zahavi added that IsraAid often partners with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Jewish federations.

Some synagogues in Edmonton are also pitching in.

Temple Beth Ora Synagogue, for example, a Reform shul, held a Shabbaton for congregants this past weekend, and rather than have them pay the Shabbaton fee, they've asked participants to donate money to the Canadian Red Cross and bring goods such as water bottles or diapers that the shul can donate.

Beth Israel Synagogue, a modern Orthodox shul in Edmonton, is assisting federation's campaign to collect clothing, toiletries and non-perishable food items and is also organizing its own diaper drive, with a goal of donating 10,000 diapers to the fire victims. It's also organizing a board game drive to donate games to the children of families staying in temporary shelters, to help keep them occupied and entertained.

Dan Horowitz, director of communications for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said a number of Canadian federations, including Edmonton's, spoke by phone May 6 to assess the needs on the ground and figure out how to best provide support.

"Unfortunately, it looks like this is going to be a long-term situation rather than a quick fix," Horowitz said. ■

Jews should stop 'whining' about York U, benefactor says

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

In a mass email addressed "to the tribe" that has been making the rounds in the Jewish community, entrepreneur and philanthropist Seymour Schulich said he's "sick and tired" of Jews complaining about anti-Semitism in Canada in general and at York University in particular.

"I grew up in Montreal, Quebec, where the school system was predominantly Catholic and Protestant. Real anti-Semitism was rife!" wrote Schulich, a York benefactor after whom the university's acclaimed Schulich School of Business is named.

"Yet in my entire life I have never experienced one iota of anti-Semitism. WHY? THE SIMPLE ANSWER IS BECAUSE I FIT IN WITH THE MAJORITIES! There was a Catholic school across the street from my Grade 8 Protestant school in Montreal. If you wore a yamulka or a talis [sic] under your shirt, the odds were pretty good you could collect a lot of rocks thrown from the Catholic schoolyard."

In an interview with The CJN, Schulich acknowledged that people have taken "great umbrage" at his email, part of which says that people shouldn't advertise their Jewishness by wearing religious garb.

"People are going to take great umbrage on that. 'Oh, I shouldn't have to do that.' Well, you should know that if you don't do it, you're asking for it. And you might get it. If I was in Quebec and I marched around the old days like that… I think I would get a few rocks thrown at me."

In the April 30 email, which was initially sent to about 70 people, and likely forwarded to many more, Schulich praised York president Mamdouh Shoukri as a "personnel [sic] friend and one of the most secular folks I know." He also suggests that all religious clubs be banned from university campuses, scoffs at the perceived success of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign, and says tensions at York relating to Israel have arisen because arts students, who make up a majority of York's student body, have too much time on their hands.

"All the problems, when you analyze them, are coming from the people studying arts. And why? They have too much time. It's very simple… I was studying chemistry. I had no time for this nonsense… I had no time to demonstrate and run around the campus raising hell about anything. The real problem at York is that we have 70 per cent arts people. The trouble starts there," Schulich told The CJN.

"And as far as York goes, I don't think York is any better or any worse than anywhere else, OK?… I don't think these boycotts amount to a hill of beans… Israel can take care of itself. I'm not worried about that for two seconds."

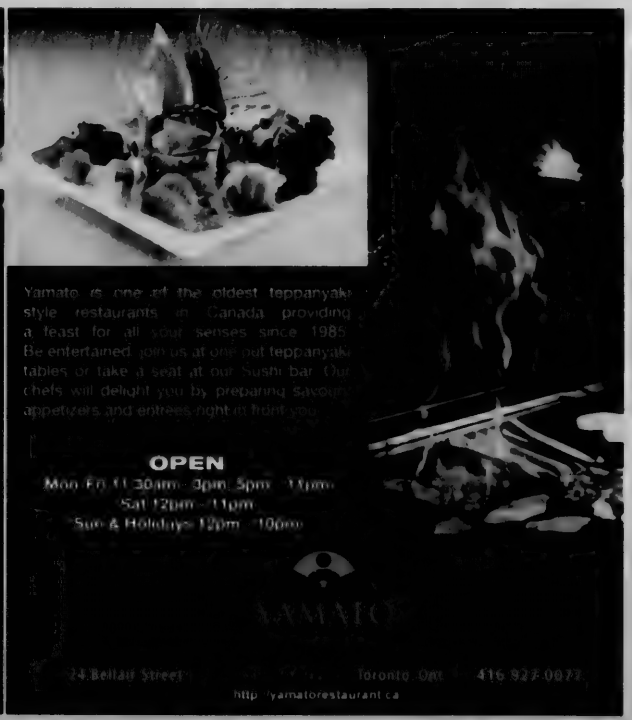
Schulich, 76, insisted that he's a strong supporter of Israel, both financially and ideologically.

"You've got a guy who has given $80 million to Israel in 10 years. I'm not anti-Israeli. I'm not anti-Semitic. I'm not a 'White Jew.' I'm just saying man up already! Stop whining and bitching about York University. You've got a good president – you don't want to go to York? Hey! Don't go!"

In a reply to Schulich's email, former federal finance minister Joe Oliver wrote that the issues facing Jewish students at York won't be solved by them hiding their Jewishness.

"I do agree Jewish students should always try to fit in with the majority… That of course does not mean compromising their core beliefs or principles, which the hard left wants them to do," Oliver wrote.

"We need to develop strategies to deal with the situation rather than pretend it does not exist and that things were worse before… the problem is not just going to go away on its own." ■



Tories urge government to reconsider relations with Iran

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Opposition Conservatives slammed the governing Liberals for failing to fully hold Iran accountable during Iran Accountability Week.

As parliamentarians marked the annual event, hosted by the Conservative caucus, Tory spokespeople said the government is moving too fast to normalize relations with Iran.

"The government should stop what it is doing," foreign affairs critic Tony Clement told The CJN, referring to reports the government is in discussions with Iran about restoring diplomatic relations. Not only would it be impossible to protect diplomatic offices in Iran – some have been firebombed by government-supported thugs – but Iran continues to pose a danger to its people and those in the region, he said.

It continues to oppress its own population, is "a disruptive force in the Middle East," continues to sponsor terrorism and "it is state policy to seek the destruction of Israel," Clement said.

Iran Accountability Week was held on Parliament Hill from May 2 to 6 to highlight human rights abuses in the Islamic state. An initiative of former Liberal MP and justice minister Irwin Cotler, the all-party program aims to draw attention to the human rights situation in Iran.

Canada severed diplomatic ties with Iran in 2012 over safety and security concerns.

Disagreement over Iran policy surfaced in Parliament last week, when Clement asked Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion how Canada could negotiate with a state sponsor of terror.

"Under the former government, Canada was alone in having an empty chair with a lot of countries when it disliked the regimes, which was the wrong approach. All our allies are asking us to stop this wrong approach, and it is what we will do with Iran," Dion said.

"In order to see progress on human rights and progress on the protection of Canada's interests and the interests of our allies, including Israel, Canada will engage with Iran with open eyes, step by step," he added.

Tory MP Peter Kent then asked Dion how Canada could negotiate improved trade relationship even while maintaining Iran on a list of state sponsors of terrorism.

Dion replied: "Every day, every week, we have different businesspeople, governments, that are going to Iran. They are negotiating for their national interests in Iran with open eyes, to make sure that the nuclear program of Iran will not be militarized. I think it is the right approach. Our allies were right to do so, and Canada will join them."

A day later, interim Tory Leader Rona Ambrose asked Prime Minister Justin Trudeau why Canada was "warming up relations" with Iran even though it sponsors terrorism and oppresses its people.

"It is important that Canada keep its eyes wide open as we cautiously re-engage with Iran alongside our allies," Trudeau replied.

"The fact is that the P5+1 deal showed significant movement in removing the nuclear ambitions from Iran's capabilities. At the same time, we recognize there continues to be state sponsorship of terrorism and violations of human rights and oppression of people within Iran linked to Iranian terrorism.

"We need to continue to engage constructively in ensuring that Iran and the Iranian people do better in the world, while holding them to account," Trudeau added.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), participated in a panel discussion during Iran Accountability Week. He noted the two major parties diverge in their policies towards Iran, but "one approach is not better than the other. They're different," he said.

CIJA believes that any change in Canadian policy should be conditional on changes in Iranian behaviour, including action on human rights abuses, the absence of religious freedom and the country's sponsorship of terrorism, he said.

Fogel believes the way Iran treats its religious minorities, including the persecuted Baha'i, should be "a litmus test" for whether the country can join the community of nations. ■

Anti-Zionism is anti-Semitism, film producer says

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Last month's disclosure of social media posts by British Labour MP Naz Shah has clarified the battle lines of Middle East discourse, says one of Canada's most prolific film and TV producers.

"Through her toxic rants, in which she urges her Facebook minions to get organized because, 'the Jews are rallying,' she lays to rest the pretense that there is any difference between Jew hatred and anti-Zionism," Robert Lantos said.

"Her proposal to ethnically cleanse Israel of its entire Jewish population, enthusiastically seconded by celebrity politician Ken Livingstone, helps to crystallize the true intent of the BDS [boycott, divestment and sanctions] brigade, an intent which has nothing to do with peace or a two-state solution."

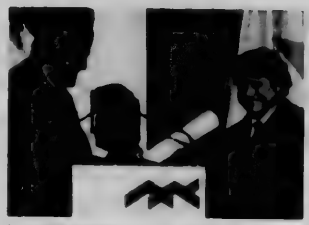
Lantos' remarks came at the May 1 Mount Carmel dinner, an annual fundraiser hosted by Canadian Friends of Haifa University, where he received an honorary doctorate. Proceeds from this year's event will generate about 100 scholarships in the university's Ambassadors Online program, a new-media course in Israel advocacy. Almost 550 people attended the event at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York hotel.

A skilled promoter for much of his career, the media mogul has leveraged his profile repeatedly to support Israel. In February, he wrote an open letter criticizing York University for allowing a pro-Palestinian mural in its student centre that some argue promotes violence against Israel.

At the dinner, he drew a line from pre-war Hungary – where he was born after the Holocaust – to modern-day "Jew hatred."

"The majority of Hungary's Jewish population was murdered in a few months," he said. "But it didn't start with violence. It began with words – and the words set the stage, which then legitimized the violence that followed… The war of words has been fought against Jews for many centuries, in many lands. After the Holocaust, we thought that this was over, once and for all. But the cycle has begun again. It is now firing on all cylinders across Europe. In France, in Belgium, in Holland, it has already led to acts of brutal violence."

Along the way, Israel and – to a lesser extent – the Jewish community has lost the progressive narrative, and even for many liberal Jews, Israel has become a sticky proposition, he said.



U of Haifa president Amos Shapira, presents Robert Lantos with an honorary doctorate.

"To defeat BDS, we must reclaim the liberal, socially engaged hearts and minds, and in particular, Jewish youth," Lantos argued. "From [U.S. Democratic presidential hopeful] Bernie Sanders to J Street and Jews for Peace, liberal Jews have come to believe that they must distance themselves from Israel in order to burnish their progressive credentials. In so doing, they march with those who would eliminate the Jewish state."

In fact, he said, BDS is "the propaganda arm of a terrorist organization intent on the destruction of the Jewish state." Activists need to highlight its connections with organizations such as Hamas.

"Israel has many warts and flaws, all of which should be and are criticized," he said. "Some of her political leaders are definitely not my own cup of tea. But it is a travesty to link arms with those who are supported by regimes which deny women's rights, torture and incarcerate dissenters, censor freedom of expression and are intent on the genocide of the Jewish state… To vanquish BDS, we must shine a light on what its true objectives are, who its allies are and who its financiers are."

After first achieving fame in 1978 with In Praise of Older Women, Lantos has produced such critically acclaimed films as Being Julia, Eastern Promises and The Sweet Hereafter.

Jewish themes pepper his work, such as in Joshua Then and Now and Barney's Version, adaptations of Mordecai Richler novels; Sword of Gideon, about the Mossad hit team assembled after the Munich Olympics massacre; and Sunshine, a multi-generational saga of a family in 20th-century Hungary.

This dinner was the last for school president Amos Shapira, who steps down in September after four years. Ron Robin, formerly of New York University, will replace him. ■

Talk to kids about abuse, Orthodox psychologist urges

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

There are two questions New York-based child psychologist David Pelcovitz is often asked by child protective service professionals about the Orthodox community that makes him cringe.

"The first question they usually ask me, is, 'What is it about you guys that you care more about the perpetrator than the victim?… This is when I want to take my yarmulke off," said Pelcovitz, who spoke Sunday to roughly 100 educators and concerned parents at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation about the impact of sexual abuse on children and how to protect them from it.

"The second question they ask… is, 'What is it about you guys that you seem to have a higher rate of sibling sexual abuse? Older brothers with younger sisters? We're seeing this as an epidemic in the New York community, and I know it happens here… we have to be aware of that. Part of it is that we need to do better sexual education with our kids. We don't talk to our kids about sexuality."

The presentation by Pelcovitz, a highly regarded clinical psychologist who specializes in childhood trauma and abuse, and is co-editor of Breaking the Silence: Child Abuse in the Jewish Community, came just a few months after Stephen Joseph Schacter, who taught at Eitz Chaim Schools between 1986 and 2004 and what is now Robbins Hebrew Academy from 2004 to 2006, was charged with possession of child pornography, gross indecency, sexual interference, sexual exploitation and sexual assault.

In addition, David Prashker, a former director of Leo Baeck Day School, pleaded guilty in California last month to possession of child pornography and served 100 days in jail. In 2008, Prashker wrote and posted sexually explicit poetry online, which led to his resignation from Leo Baeck.

Offering tips on prevention, Pelcovitz said it's important to educate children about the dangers of sexual abuse in the same way parents would teach children about what to do in the event of fire or how to cross a busy intersection.

"Don't scare your kids… Research shows that you want there to be a little bit of anxiety so that they take it seriously, but not so much that the anxiety becomes incapacitating. The guiding force in these situations is to set it up in a way that is no different from the way that we teach children about fire safety at Chanukah or water safety in the summer," he said.

Pelcovitz said speaking to kids about abuse can't be a "one-shot" lecture, adding that the lesson will be most effective if parents give them scenarios to consider, such as "What happens if your uncle tickles you past the point of comfort?"

Pelcovitz offered a script to help broach the subjects with children. "Your body belongs to you… you have a right to say who touches you and how. If someone touches you in a way that makes you feel funny, it is OK to say no," he said.

BAYT spiritual leader Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, who introduced Pelcovitz, addressed arguments often heard in the frum community that perpetrators shouldn't be reported, because that's an act of mesira, which refers to handing a Jew over to outside authorities.

"I want to make it very clear that this is not a correct position to take. When there is a fire, you call the fire department. When there is a medical emergency, you call the hospital. When a person is sexually abusing a child, you call the Canadian authorities. There are no ifs, ands or buts. There is no Halachah of mesira involved. And I am prepared… to challenge any rosh yeshiva, and argue from the halachic standpoint, that they are absolutely mistaken, 100 per cent," Rabbi Korobkin said.

"We have to err on the side of caution for the sake of these innocent neshamahs [souls] and not worry about the perpetrators, no matter who they are in the community, no matter how highly regarded they are in the community." ■

New Hebrew U programs target disability, haredi issues

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Developments at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's school of social work will help address Israel's emerging social needs when it comes to people with disabilities, the haredi community and those who hold leadership positions in civil society organizations.

Mimi Ajzenstadt, dean of the Paul Baerwald School of Social Work and Social Welfare at Hebrew U, was in Toronto last month to meet with potential academic partners and donors and inform the community about the developments and expansions at the school.

In an interview with The CJN, Ajzenstadt explained that in an effort to better serve Israeli people with disabilities, the school is establishing the Centre for the Study of Disabilities to examine the issue beyond a medical and psychological lens. Through the centre and the disability studies program, students will help people with disabilities integrate better into Israeli society by learning to focus on individuals and consider their family, community and policies.

"There are some really good laws and regulations, but the people who have to administer them and work with them are only now starting to understand what it means – not only the disability, not only the causes, but the social impact, or the social framework, or the social context. What does it mean to live with the stigma? How does it impact your family members?" Ajzenstadt said.

"Israel is now moving into a stage that is starting to acknowledge that people with disabilities are regular citizens and deserve all the same rights, of course, but at the same time, they deserve that many obstacles will be removed so they can be part of society… They will join the army, go to school, to university, and be part of the labour market."

Another initiative Ajzenstadt is promoting is the inauguration of a social entrepreneurship teaching program for graduate students holding leadership positions in civil society organizations and NGOs.

"There are a lot of organizations in the private or NGO market that take care of people with disabilities, but there is no solid program that teaches students what to do… about all the social, cultural and political issues [involved]."

The teaching program will incorporate a social entrepreneurship accelerator that will foster academic co-operation between students from the social entrepreneurship program and students from other disciplines across the university.

Ajzenstadt said the social work school is a microcosm of Israeli society in itself – with a student body that's represented by the immigrant community and the Arab community – and it's gaining popularity with the haredi community as well.

With about 30 haredi students currently enrolled in social work, she's confident their involvement in the field will help address social challenges in that community.

"It was very difficult to get to this community, because it is a closed community. They have their rabbis and their own regulations for the practice of life; and to seek professional advice, [that] didn't happen on a regular basis," she said, adding that having haredi professionals working in the field can be a "good linkage or bridge between our school and the haredi community."

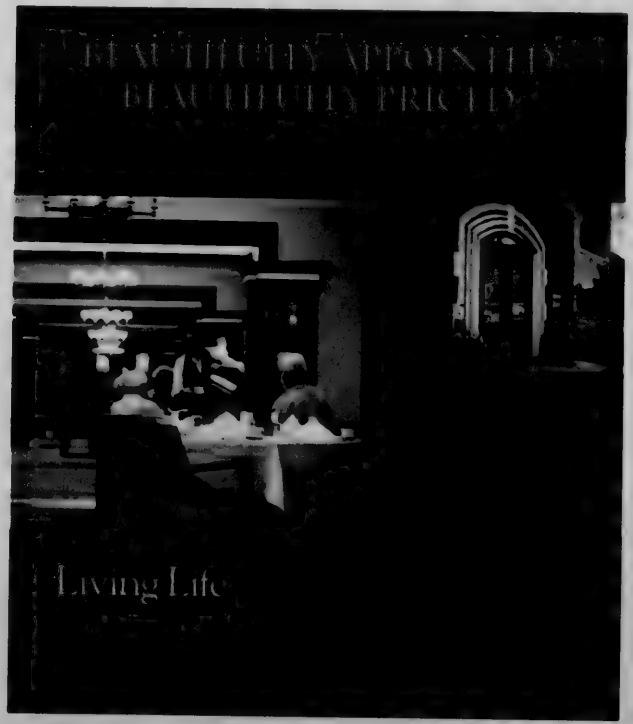
She said one of the purposes of her Toronto visit was to meet with members of the haredi community to gain some insight into how to better serve Israel's community.

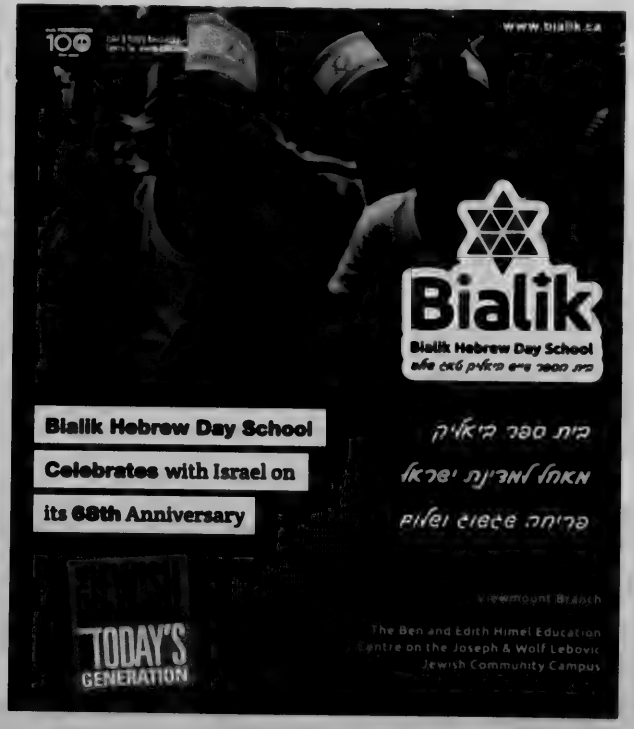
"We need to do more research, we need to give special courses that actually speak about the haredi community and their needs and how to adjust the social work practices to their community… When it comes to disability studies, I can see what other schools are doing throughout the world. But here, this is something new."

Another of her aims during her visit was to further "internationalize" the school by partnering with the University of Toronto.

"It's not surprising that we want to establish good collaborations with them because we are both leading social work schools and we share many ideas… we look at social justice and human rights through social work," she said.

"This time, we formally signed a student exchange agreement between both faculties. It has to be finalized by the university authorities, but we already got the green light, so it is only a formality." ■





Israeli analyst sees no end of conflict

plungen@thecjn.ca

Author and analyst Yossi Alpher has a fond spot in his heart for the work done by Peace Now and its international affiliates. At the same time, he has a tough message for the organization: there is, at this time, no hope for a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict resulting in a two-state solution.

At the same time, he has a message for the right-wing nationalist camp as well, which might otherwise feel vindicated in its skepticism of the peace process. We are on route to a place no one wants to go to: a bi-national state that will either be undemocratic, or not Jewish.

"We are on a slippery slope to an ugly, one-state reality," he said.

Alpher, author of No End of Conflict: Rethinking Israel-Palestine, was in Toronto last week as part of a three-city Canadian tour organized by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, which took him to Montreal and Ottawa as well. After speaking at Congregation Darchei Noam in Toronto, he flew to New Zealand, to discuss his latest book at the Auckland Writers Festival.

Alpher's bona fides as an advocate of a peaceful resolution to the conflict are long and distinguished. He served as a special adviser to prime minister Ehud Barak at Camp David during negotiations with Yasser Arafat. He co-edited Bitterlemons, a website dedicated to fostering mutual dialogue, with Ghassan Khatib, a former minister in the Palestinian Authority government. He served with Israeli military intelligence and later in Mossad before becoming director of the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

So it is with a measure of reluctance that he has come to his conclusion. But it's one born of experience and recognition of political realities, he explained.

In some ways, Alpher acknowledges, he's repeating the nationalist critique of the peace process – that the other side will never agree to a final settlement unless all its demands are met, including the right of return of millions of Palestinian refugees to Israel, spelling an end to the Zionist endeavour.

But, he continues, the nationalist Israeli camp, by expanding its settlements and gobbling up land, is making it impossible for any arrangement that will be palatable to the Palestinian side.

And he rejects as "dreaming" the views of some in the government that the Palestinians will ever accept the status quo if their economic condition improves or that they will ever be satisfied with autonomy.

In all, Alpher's analysis presented a rather bleak view of the prospects for peace. And as far as he is concerned, there is plenty of blame to go around.

"I wrote the book because I was fed up with the approach of the international community, like statements from Leon Panetta, [the former U.S.] secretary of defence, to just get back to the damn table, from [former British prime minister Tony] Blair and [U.S. Secretary of State John] Kerry, that the outline of the solution is there.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," he said.

Based on his experience and from examining the offer presented in 2008 by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, which "went way beyond Camp David," Alpher believes "the Oslo process has run its course."

As far as he is concerned, issues pertaining to the post-1967 conflict are resolvable (borders, settlements, a capital in Jerusalem), but those connected to pre-1967 are not. These include the return of millions of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to Israel.

Yossi Alpher

Furthermore, how can you come to an agreement when Abbas denies there ever was a Jewish Temple in Jerusalem? In saying that, he rejects the Jewish connection to the land and the notion that the Jews are the native people coming back to their country, he said.

"The two parties are not close to agreement," he added.

Alpher acknowledges he doesn't have a solution to the conflict, but he advises North American Jews to accept reality and prepare for a difficult future in which Israel is bound to become a unitary state with a Palestinian majority, or even a strong minority.

The Diaspora Jewish communities will have to manage a relationship in which Israel "is no longer a Jewish state or the state of the Jewish people," he warned. ■

Commonwealth Jewish group seeks support

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Clive Lawton

Not long ago, the Maccabi World Union (MWU) called on Clive Lawton for help. The MWU, which puts together the Maccabiah Games in Israel every four years, was looking to be more inclusive, so they were curious about whether he knew of Jewish communities around the world who could send athletes to the Games.

As it happens, Lawton did. As CEO of the Commonwealth Jewish Council, he was familiar with tiny Jewish communities around the world not usually associated with Jewish life, such as Lesotho and Mauritius in Africa, Singapore and Sri Lanka in Australasia, St. Lucia and Antigua in the Caribbean, and the island of Jersey in Europe.

Lesotho and Sri Lanka each have only two or three families. "There are tiny flags being flown all around the world," Lawton said.

Each of those communities is part of the 33-member Commonwealth Jewish Council, which was founded in 1983 and whose membership largely parallels that of the British Commonwealth. The council is now "restructuring its operations to provide a more effective global reach."

Lawton was in Toronto recently to make the case for the Canadian Jewish community to consider becoming one of four "hubs" in the revamped organization.

Canada would join the United Kingdom, Australia and South Africa as a council hub, each with responsibility to foster good relations and to aid with development of small local communities in their region. The U.K., for example, would maintain regular contacts with communities in Gibraltar, Malta, Jersey and Cyprus; Australia with New Zealand, India, Singapore and Sri Lanka; South Africa with Lesotho, Zimbabwe and others; and Canada with Belize, Jamaica, Trinidad, St. Lucia and other Caribbean communities.

Lawton met with representative of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the UIA and rabbinic groups. His message was simple: the Commonwealth represents states once settled by Britain who now share common values such as democracy, human rights, freedom and the rule of law.

"The Jews are a cross-Commonwealth reality with a relationship with each other, and we espouse the values that the Commonwealth espouses," Lawton said.

The larger communities, with their infrastructure and expertise, can play an important role – at little or no cost – in helping smaller communities address issues such as anti-Semitism, anti-Israel agitation and other issues, Lawton said.

He pointed to New Zealand Jews being assisted from abroad when that country considered banning the practice of shchitah.

"The capacity [of New Zealand Jews] to say that the world's Jews are behind them must have strengthened their hand," Lawton contends.

In Asia, he added, a Commonwealth Jewish group would provide the "context in which Jews can talk to Pakistan and Malaysian government and leaders of civil society."

The benefits of such an interaction played out in November 2015 in Malta during the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting when Lawton met representatives of Pakistan. They discussed the Jewish connection to Israel and myths held about the Jews.

"We had a couple of very frank meetings where we exchanged views. I'd like to say the stuff they heard from me is stuff they never heard before," he said.

Lawton said the Commonwealth organization isn't asking much of the hub nations, only to lend support in advocacy issues when they arise and help with community development, which he suggested could be as simple as linking the Jamaican community to the Birthright program.

Canada's Jewish community is receptive to Lawton's proposal, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said. There are within the Commonwealth "very small… communities with Jewish life hanging by a thread that could use support." He said CIJA would seek the support of its stakeholders – Canada's federated communities – and, assuming they approve, will partner with the council.

The council was created about 30 years ago by the late British MP Greville Janner and the British Board of Deputies. At the time, Janner called upon his contacts around the world, including Dorothy Reitman, former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, to get the organization off the ground. For years, the council was virtually a one-man show run by Janner, and "as he faded, so did the council," Lawton said.

Lawton, an educator by profession and one of founders in Britain of Limmud, an adult learning program, said a revived council would be a more collaborative and open organization than it had been in the past. ■

Councillor apologizes to Jews, but not Chabad

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jeremy Searle

Cote des Neiges-Notre Dame de Grâce councillor Jeremy Searle issued a qualified apology for his accusation that a Chabad rabbi and certain councillors who supported a proposed housing development for the site of a former church were using "Jewish guilt" to deter area residents who opposed the project.

At the May 2 borough meeting, Searle read a statement that made it clear he was not apologizing to those individuals, but rather to the Jewish community. At a previous borough meeting on April 4, the independent councillor lashed out at those who, he said, accused opponents of the project of being motivated by anti-Semitism.

At that meeting, the council voted to withdraw its support for the demolition of the former St. Columba Church and the construction of seven attached houses, after two years of contentious public consultation. Searle was against the development from the outset.

"I want to begin by apologizing to all those I inadvertently offended with my comments," Searle stated. "I realize that I painted the whole Jewish community with the same brush, which is unfair, offensive and was never my intention... Please hear me when I state emphatically that I am in no way anti-Jewish. The mother of my [two] children is Jewish and Judaism is the heritage my children identify with."

Searle said that what he wanted to do in his April 4 remarks was to "draw a connection between Chabad NDG's vested interest in pushing for the development project and the suspicious timing of the unfounded accusations against the neighbours living on Hingston [Avenue]."

At the April 4 meeting, Chabad NDG director Rabbi Yisroel Bernath said users of the centre, which has been located for almost three years in the former hall adjacent to the church, have been the targets of "harassment, demonization and bigotry," that they have been "bullied" and "watched, photographed and held to unreasonable scrutiny." Chabad received numerous complaints of noise and other nuisances from neighbours, he said.

The developers' plan was to maintain that hall, where Chabad is a rent-free tenant.

Searle insisted May 2 that he wants Chabad to continue to operate in that location.

"I want Chabad to make a permanent home in NDG, and if their serious allegations of anti-Semitic harassment are valid, then I want these alleged crimes dealt with by the police without delay," he said.

"What I don't want is the opposition of the neighbours and myself to be taken out of context and twisted into something it is not."

He deplored that "some" used the charge of anti-Semitism to "derail the real conversation about the pros and cons" of the now-abandoned project. Besides Rabbi Bernath, he later identified borough mayor Russell Copeman and councillors Lionel Perez and Marvin Rotrand as those for whom he intended his April 4 charges.

In March, 224 area residents signed a public registry against the project, well above the minimum of 166 that would have forced a referendum on the issue under Quebec law.

The century-old church property was bought from the Anglican diocese by a development group, headed by Robert Blatt and David Kakon, in 2013. Blatt himself told The CJN in March that he found it "very upsetting" that "the Jewish element" was brought up by opponents he had heard.

Searle looks at it differently. He said of the registry results: "This exercise in grassroots democracy against an insensitive, tone-deaf council is a total victory for the community."

People were opposed primarily because they want the church preserved and used for some kind of social or recreational purpose, Searle told The CJN. He favours the property being bought by the city.

The neighbours might have accepted a residential project if the design was appropriate to this historic area, he said.

Chabad launched a fundraising campaign last month to buy the hall, saying it must come up with the money by the end of May. Rabbi Bernath said the goal was at least $800,000, which with the $500,000 Chabad has in the bank, would be enough to make a down payment and support a mortgage.

Chabad spokesperson Noah Sidel said May 3 that the campaign is proceeding.

Searle, who said he's been the subject of hateful social media messages, regretted that Rabbi Bernath didn't attend the borough meeting. "The cowardly rabbi has demonized me successfully to raise funds for his faith community. Now he lacks the courage to face me in public," he said.

Rabbi Bernath responded: "I have publicly invited Mr. Searle a number of times to discuss the issue and continue to extend an open invitation." ■

B'nai Brith audit finds anti-Semitism moving online

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

For the past 34 years, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada has monitored a nearly constant upward trend in the incidents of anti-Semitism, though the trend seems to have plateaued in the last five years. At the same time, the organization has also noted a trend within the trend.

As the level of anti-Semitism continues to remain constant, the nature of the events has changed, moving increasingly into the digital and online sphere.

"It is now clear that the landscape of anti-Semitism has become one of social media and online message boards, rather than spray paint and swastikas," states the League's Annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents 2015. It called for a re-examination of the void left by the repeal of Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which addressed Internet hate propaganda.

Altogether, 1,277 incidents were reported in the audit, down from a record 1,627 in 2014 and nearly the same as the 1,274 incidents recorded in 2013.

The vast majority of incidents in 2015 – 1,123 – were described as harassment, such as verbal slurs, stereotyping, systematic discrimination in the workplaces or schools, hate propaganda and threats of violence.

While anti-Semitism has kept up with the times by moving online, incidents of vandalism dropped to their lowest level in 15 years, while violent occurrences dropped by half, from 19 in 2014 to 10 in 2015.

One notable incident involved the shooting death of Edmonton police Const. Daniel Woodall, of the city's anti-hate unit. He was killed in June while trying to serve an arrest warrant on an individual being charged with criminal harassment for bullying a local family. The audit is dedicated in his memory.

The audit noted there has been only a five per cent variation in the number of incidents over the past five years. The year 2014 was an exception, with 1,627 incidents, but it is considered the worst year for anti-Semitism in Canada since records have been kept. The spike in incidents correlates to the Israeli conflict in Gaza that year, the audit notes.

The league's findings parallel those of the Toronto Police, although the numbers the audit reports are substantially higher.

According to the Toronto Police Service 2015 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report, Jews continued to be the single-most targeted victim group in the city, with 31 occurrences that involved Jews and another that targeted an Israeli, out of a total of 134 occurrences. Like the audit, police noted that the total number of incidents involving Jews dropped in 2015 from the year before, although in both years Jews were the single-most targeted group.

> There is clearly not enough social pressure against anti-Semitism

Unlike the League for Human Rights, which reports incidents across the country, Toronto police only record incidents that could be considered criminal offences.

The audit found increased co-operation between "white nationalist and racialist elements," which had largely been isolated and independent from each other.

At the same time, the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel grew on university campuses. "The movement itself has been shown to lead to anti-Semitism," the audit states.

Asked why anti-Semitism persists despite education programs and the stigma attached to racism, B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn said it's "so difficult to combat because of the inherent logical inconsistencies of the rhetoric, and lately, the veiled attempt to couch it as legitimate political activism.

"There is clearly not enough social pressure against anti-Semitism in particular, or we wouldn't see years like 2014, when a foreign conflict led to individual Canadian Jews being targeted in the streets. Today it is socially acceptable to engage in anti-Semitism as long as it's justified as opposition to Zionism and Israeli policy, even when the arguments used are classic anti-Semitic tropes," he said.

The audit noted that BDS activists ignore the increasingly anti-Jewish rhetoric of Palestinian leaders, including by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who said Jews "defile" the Al-Aqsa Mosque with "their filthy feet."

"The fact that boycott activists are willing to ignore jihadist rhetoric specifically aimed at the destruction of the Jewish People speaks to an underlying anti-Semitic motivation that should be concerning to all Canadians," the audit stated. ■

Canadian students shine at moot beit din competition

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Montreal's Herzliah High School made history at the 2016 Ravsak Moot Beit Din competition when three Herzliah teams won first place in each of the divisions.

"This was the first time any school had even two teams that won," Herzliah head of school Laurence Kutler said.

Moot Beit Din is an intellectual contest that challenges Jewish high school students to examine contemporary situations through the lens of Jewish ethics and morals.

The contest, which was held this year on March 31 in West Palm Beach, Fla., is presented by Ravsak, a non-profit group that serves as a resource and network for more than 135 Jewish day schools across North America.

Each of the 29 teams from 21 schools was required to present a written and oral argument before a panel of rabbis, scholars and lawyers. This year's case study asked students to examine Jewish legal perspectives on medicine, and to respond to questions about the medical treatment of an elderly man with Alzheimer's disease facing a life-threatening heart condition.

Kutler explained that while each team in each division argued the same case, teams in the first division were required to find their own Jewish sources to back up their stance, teams in the second division were given a list of Jewish sources to cite and had permission to refer to non-Jewish sources such as medical research documents, while teams in the third group had to adhere to the Jewish sources they were provided with to make their case.

In one of the divisions, Herzliah and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto placed first and second, respectively, adding to Canada's success at the competition.

The winning TanenbaumCHAT team was represented by Summer Hart, Avigayil Margolis, Ryan Ripsman and Ben Shore.

Shore, 16, said although all the teams had the same case to argue, it was interesting to note the varied conclusions that were reached.

"I think it was a very interesting case. There was a lot of applying Halachah to modern ideas and it was very interesting how we went about answering the questions, bringing in sources that you might not think are necessarily relevant but were able to be applied," Shore said.

"Everyone worked so hard and it was really amazing."

Ian Langleben, a 15-year-old Herzliah student who was on the winning team in the third division with Ysabella Hazan, Jonathan Cohen and Moshe Ohana, said he thinks the way in which they presented their argument won the judges over.

"We presented the argument not only in a way that would be telling the judges what would be the best options, but in the form of a discussion between the members of the group as if we were a Jewish court discussing the best options, as if we were a panel of rabbis," Langleben said.

"We think that created an aspect that added to the content... the drama aspect helped push us over and above the rest."

Summer Hart, an 18-year-old Grade 12 student on the TanenbaumCHAT team, said her participation in this competition benefited her in a number of ways.

"I think I gained more confidence in my public speaking and gained a better appreciation for Jewish Halachah and Talmud," she said.

Langleben said he was impressed with the event, adding, "You get to think about modern problems in a way that's refreshing because you're adding the Jewish aspect to it and looking at it from a completely different perspective. The event itself is fun and also a great opportunity to meet other students from across North America." ■

Successful refugee claims from Israel are way down

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Canada continued to accept refugees from Israel last year, but the numbers slowed to a trickle.

Figures obtained by The CJN from the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) show that of 60 claims from Israel finalized in 2015, only seven were approved — an acceptance rate of 12 per cent.

It's the lowest total number of accepted claims in recent memory. The rest of the claims were either abandoned or withdrawn.

The IRB's acceptance rate from Israel the year before was five per cent. There were 11 approvals based on 117 cases finalized in 2014.

Ottawa's acceptance rate for refugees from Israel has dropped steadily since 2005, when it was 29 per cent. In recent years, the largest number of refugees, 168, were admitted in 2003.

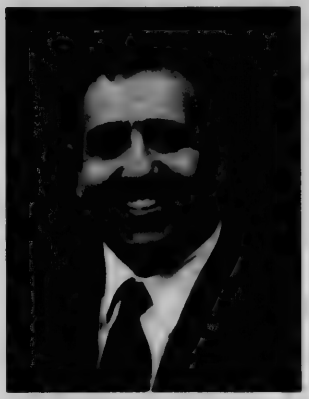
Since 1999, 857 claimants from Israel have been granted refugee status in Canada.

Gone are the days when the vast majority of refugee claims from Israel were made by immigrants from the former Soviet Union, who then springboarded to Canada, agreed Toronto immigration lawyer Guidy Mamann.

The IRB does not identify claimants or give reasons for acceptance or rejection of claims.

But in recent years, Mamann noted, successful claims in Canada have been made by Arab citizens of Israel, and they've generally fallen into three categories: individuals suspected of collaborating with Israel or who resist carrying out terrorist attacks against the Jewish state; women who brought dishonour on their families by refusing arranged marriages or engaging in certain behaviours; and gay men and women.

Refugees must prove a well-founded fear of persecution if they were to be returned to Israel, meaning that Israeli courts or police cannot protect them.



Immigration lawyer Guidy Mamann

Arab villages within Israel "continue to be a place where the culture is a little bit different than the modern culture in the big cities," Mamann told The CJN. "Very old ideas remain in those communities. If they discover one of their children is gay and is in a same-sex relationship, the roof will come off. That individual is going to be in tremendous danger no matter what the Israeli government does or does not offer in the way of protection."

One needs only to be suspected of collaborating with Israel or labelled a collaborator in error to be in danger, Mamann said. "Even somebody who sells his home to a Jewish family could be very easily targeted as a collaborator," he added.

Mamann noted that the low number of approvals from Israel in 2015 is remarkable. "In a country immersed in religious and political conflict, we should be seeing hundreds and hundreds of people seeking refuge from allegations of oppression."

> [The IRB was] suckered into approving those claims. They were being fed nonsense, and they bought it

He said the low acceptance rate is testament to Israel's ability to protect vulnerable minorities, but "also tells us something about the evolution of [the IRB]."

Canada's acceptance of refugees from Israel was once a sore point between the two countries.

Beginning in the early 1990s, Canada took in large numbers of refugees from Israel who had arrived from the former Soviet Union and then went to Canada, a favourite destination.

Typically, these claimants alleged that in Israel, they faced discrimination and were denied jobs, education and housing, and were even threatened and harassed, because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews. Israel countered that as a multicultural democracy, it did not produce refugees. It said such claims were spurious and designed simply to gain entry to other countries.

Mamann said the board was "suckered into approving those claims. They were being fed nonsense, and they bought it."

He said some IRB members were antagonistic toward Israel.

But these days, the numbers, especially the rejection rate, show the board is confident that Israel has robust protections, Mamann said.

The IRB has a separate category for refugee claims from "Palestine." Last year, it finalized 107 cases from Palestine and approved 57 of them, for an approval rate of 53 per cent.

Since 1999, 850 refugee claimants from Palestine have been accepted into Canada.

Edward Corrigan, a London, Ont.-based immigration lawyer who has had Palestinian clients, said the IRB numbers refer to claimants from Gaza, the West Bank and perhaps east Jerusalem.

Because claims are made from the country of origin, they may also include stateless Palestinians in Lebanon, Syria, Iraq and the Gulf states, Corrigan said.

A "large number" of Palestinians from Gaza are suspected of supporting, spying for, or being members of the rival Fatah faction, he explained.

"All these would be serious risk factors for Palestinians in Gaza," which is controlled by Hamas, deemed a terrorist group by Canada.

Corrigan said that would account for most of the refugee claims from Gaza. Others might include religious disputes.

Claims from the West Bank are "much more complicated" because of the presence of Jewish settlers, the Israeli military and factional tensions between Hamas and Fatah.

"Most [members] of the [IRB] would recognize that the ability of the Palestinian Authority to protect people is limited," Corrigan said.

The total includes "some" gay Palestinians. Corrigan said the IRB might also be hearing claims from Muslim women who married outside their faith or someone their family does not approve. ■

Man denied entry to Canada for being member of Fatah

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Federal Court of Canada has upheld a ruling by immigration officials that denied entry to the country by a Palestinian national because he was affiliated with Fatah, which it described as a terrorist group.

In a February ruling recently made public, the court found that the Immigration Division of the Immigration and Refugee Board was right to deny entry to Akram Muslih Anteer because he was once a member of Fatah, the largest political party in the West Bank.

The court upheld a definition of Fatah as a "terrorist" group, even though it is not recognized as such by the federal government.

Anteer, a national of the Palestinian Authority and resident of Sweden, arrived in Canada in April 2013 and claimed refugee status.

The Immigration Division (ID) of the IRB believed he was a member of Fatah, "and that Fatah is an organization that engages, has engaged, or will engage in terrorist acts," stated the ruling by Judge Cecily Strickland.

"The ID found that the evidence established that Fatah was a terrorist organization." It determined that Anteer was inadmissible on security grounds and in June 2015, he was returned to Sweden.

Anteer then sought a judicial review of his case.

The court noted that when he was interviewed by the Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) at the port of entry, Anteer denied being a citizen or resident of any other country. He said he had resided in Israel and Jordan from 2002 to 2012, that his last permanent residence was Jordan, and acknowledged that he was a member of Fatah.

In May 2013 and January 2014, Anteer was further questioned by a CBSA inland enforcement officer and, the court said, provided his membership card for the Palestine National Liberation Movement, also known as Fatah, with an expiry date of August 2012.

Boy's bar mitzvah money goes to Guatemalan schoolkids

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jacob Katz and his family will be returning to Toronto this month after living in Guatemala for almost two years.

And while they'll be packing up many belongings for home, Jacob will be leaving something very important behind – his bar mitzvah money.

He's donating all the money from his recent bar mitzvah in the Central American nation to Access Education – Guatemala Children's Fund. The Toronto-based charity, founded by Adrienne Rosen, builds schools in Guatemala and provides scholarships to children who can't afford to pay school fees.

In a recent phone interview, Jacob proudly told The CJN that through his mitzvah project, he will be helping more than 30 children attend high school this year. "Before I came to Guatemala, I knew about poor people, but I never saw any.

"Now I've been to their homes, and some [homes] have the whole family living in a one-room house. That's when I saw real poverty."

He said he decided to give his bar mitzvah money to Access Education after visiting the small town of La Union for a middle school graduation. "The kids that graduated were the first kids to pass middle school in that town."

He noted that education isn't free in Guatemala, and those new graduates need to pay fees to attend high school, which will be in a nearby town until Access Education finishes building the high school wing in La Union.

In his blog, Jacob wrote that his goal was to raise $3,600. However, he exceeded that amount by $1,120.

Jacob is linked to Access Education through his mother, Claire Merbaum, a Toronto educator who has been on the board of this charity for eight years.

Jacob Katz is pictured with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, spiritual leader of Toronto's City Shul, at his recent bar mitzvah in Guatemala.

She said that after a couple of visits to Guatemala on behalf of Access, she wanted her family to have the opportunity to live in Guatemala. She was particularly interested in Panajachel, a small gentrified tourist town with a good mix of American expats, international volunteers and indigenous people.

Panajachel is about a three-hour drive from Guatemala City and an equal distance from La Union.

Merbaum, who speaks Spanish, was able to find a teaching position at the Robert Muller Life School in Panajachel. This non-profit international school offers an English immersion program and provides scholarships to 30 per cent of its students, many of whom are Mayan.

Merbaum's husband Josh Katz, an IT specialist, took on more domestic responsibilities in Guatemala.

Their two children, Jacob and Jennifer, 10, had been students at the Toronto Heschel School and are attending the international school.

Jacob prepared for his bar mitzvah through weekly Skype meetings with Toronto educator Dori Levine, Merbaum said.

"Technology really enabled all of this [bar mitzvah] preparation to happen."

The family observed Shabbat in Panajachel, but for the High Holidays, they travelled to Guatemala City for services at Adat Israel, a Reform congregation, led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, founding rabbi of Toronto's City Shul.

She's on the advisory board of Access Education and discovered Adat Israel six years ago on a trip to Guatemala City following board work she did for Access in La Union.

"The congregants [of Adat Israel] were a flock without a shepherd," she said. "I helped them become a real congregation, and through this effort, the congregation became accepted by the World Union for Progressive Judaism [the worldwide umbrella of the Reform movement]."

Her role is that of volunteer rabbi, and she visits the congregation once a year. This year, she timed the visit with Passover so she could officiate at Jacob's bar mitzvah and lead a community seder for Adat Israel members.

Rabbi Goldstein made it clear she doesn't do destination bar and bat mitzvahs. She said Jacob's bar mitzvah was an exception, because he and his family are part of the Adat Israel community. They helped with High Holiday services there, and in Toronto they attended High Holiday services at City Shul.

She called the bar mitzvah a "perfect connection" between Guatemala, City Shul, Adat Israel and Access Education.

She said when Jacob was called up for an aliyah on Shabbat morning, it was the first bar mitzvah for the Guatemalan congregation. "It was so fabulous."

The congregation marked the occasion with the completion of a striking new Aron Kodesh that was hand-made by two congregants. "They rushed to get it done on time. It was very emotional when we dedicated the Ark.

"The depth of [the congregants'] passion is palpable. They're deeply in love with being Jewish, against all odds."

A second bar mitzvah ceremony – attended by some 50 guests from Toronto – took place a few days later at a hotel in the colonial town of Antigua, a popular tourist destination.

Rabbi Goldstein described Jacob as a young person with depth and a big heart.

She said in his dvar Torah, he spoke about the difference between living with "kids who want and kids who need." ■

The court noted that Anteer initially stated that he had joined Fatah when he was 10 years old and later stated that he joined "when Oslo took place," which the enforcement officer "thought likely meant the signing of the Oslo accords by Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization in 1993."

Anteer said he had achieved "cadre level" of membership in Fatah, the court found.

"He also described his role within Fatah, which included identifying and intercepting opponents of Fatah and working with high ranking Fatah officials, and stated that he reported to the head of Fatah in the Jenin area, Ata Abu Rumeila."

> The... evidence is clear that Fatah engaged in acts of violence and terrorism

The CBSA officer noted that Rumeila was the reputed head of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade (AAMB) in Jenin. The group was added to Canada's list of terror groups in 2003.

"The documentary evidence is clear that Fatah engaged in acts of violence and terrorism both before the denunciation of terrorism in 1989 and, through the AAMB, during the second intifadah from 2000 to at least 2007," the ruling stated.

The IRB said it is "likely" that Fatah "did not entirely disassociate itself from acts of terrorism against the Israeli state, even after renouncing armed struggle, and that the most notorious faction within Fatah, the AAMB, did not exist separately from Fatah as a whole."

There was "sufficient evidence to ground the [IRB's] conclusion that Fatah was a terrorist organization," the ruling stated.

The court noted that Anteer also said he was at the late Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat's compound when it was under siege by Israel in 2002, was wounded, and was subsequently held at an Israeli detention centre until released in 2005.

He was arrested twice more by Israeli forces, and in 2009, was expelled from Israel and removed to Jordan.

The court said Anteer denied Fatah was a terrorist group and that he engaged in or promoted acts of terror. That he is no longer a member of Fatah "is not relevant," the court ruled, adding that he remained a member until at least 2012.

The IRB's decision to deny Anteer entry was "reasonable," the court ruled and dismissed his request for a judicial review. ■

In Gaza, deadly flames expose a fragile standoff

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

In one sudden and tragic moment on the night of Friday May 6, discussion over the latest escalation of violence between Hamas and Israel was relegated to secondary importance for some residents of Gaza. Local media began reporting extensively on an incident in the northwest of the Strip, in the Shati refugee camp.

Three toddlers from the al-Hindi family had perished in a fire in their home, caused by the candles lit in their room. The horror was reinforced by images of the three bodies that quickly spread across social media and on news sites that decided not to blur out the pictures.

By the next morning, a vitriolic blame game between Hamas and Fatah was in full swing, with Israel also being connected to the incident.

At the centre of the stormy debate is the question of who is responsible for the continual power outages that led the bereaved family (like tens of thousands of other Gaza families) to light candles.

The accusations began with members of the Hindi family themselves. On Saturday morning, they published pictures of some of the men in the extended family standing amid the rubble of what was left of the house, holding portraits of Palestinian Prime Minister Rami Hamdallah and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Mahmoud Abbas.

On the pictures it was written "child killers."

The response from Ramallah came swiftly.

Within a few hours, Jamal al-Muhsin, a member of Fatah's central committee, said the Hindi family themselves were responsible for the deaths of the three children because they did not heed the instructions of the Gaza authorities, who urge residents not to leave candles burning in homes when dealing with power outages.

Muhsin, who is considered one of the closest men to Abbas, also said that Hamas was responsible for the incident, because it does not allow the government of Hamdallah to operate in the Strip and deal with the power problem.

> At the centre of the stormy debate is the question of who is responsible for the continual power outages

Additionally, in an attempt to ease the criticism against the PA over the fire in Gaza, Abbas spoke over the phone to the father of the three killed children. Hamdallah also announced the family will be given a new house and some money.

But the story doesn't end there.

At the funeral for the three children Saturday afternoon, Hamas' Gaza head Ismail Haniyeh accused the government in Ramallah of strongly opposing a seaport in Gaza and refusing to "establish projects" to lift the siege –the security blockade imposed by Israel and Egypt on Gaza, to prevent its Hamas terror rulers from importing weaponry.

"Who bears the responsibility?" asked Haniyeh. "Who takes $70 million in taxes each month? Who insists on imposing a tax on fuel for the power station? Who refuses to extend the gas line from Israel to the power station in Gaza?" Haniyeh fumed, while noting that the PA's shortcomings did not detract from "the crimes of the occupation" – i.e. Israel.

On Sunday morning, May 8, residents of the Strip awoke to find a massive billboard placed at a central Gazan junction that featured blood splattered across Abbas and Hamdallah.

"Our blood is on your necks," the billboard says.

At the heart of the power supply dispute is an excise tax on fuel that comes from Israel via the PA. Hamas refuses to pay and demands the government in Ramallah pony up.

The PA is paying for half of the tax now and says Hamas must pay the other half.

Meanwhile, the power company claims that it does not have enough money to buy sufficient gas. One can guess, then, that the power outages will continue. And therefore, the residents of Gaza will continue to use candles for light.

Still, even as Hamas speaks out against the PA, it seems to be doing whatever possible to avoid another round of fighting with Israel, limiting itself in its response to Israeli tunnel-seeking incursions into the Strip and seemingly accommodating, however grudgingly, Israeli activity within Gazan territory.

In recent days the Israel Defence Forces have operated just inside Gaza – in a strip of 150 metres from the border within Palestinian territory. Hamas was content with firing a limited number of mortars into open areas in protest.

What it did not do was fire rockets at Israeli towns or to send out its special forces for a raid by land or by sea.

During the days that the IDF operated within the strip, Hamas sent messages to Israel via Qatar, Egypt, the UN and others to say that it was not interested in another war. An agreement was indirectly created between the two sides – with the help of Egyptian mediators – under which Israel will leave this inside "perimeter" soon, Hamas will cease firing, and during the fighting Hamas won't do more than fire a few perfunctory rounds.

Practically speaking, in a manner that it would never admit to, Hamas thus signaled it would not go to war over the recent Israeli operations on the border. Even in Haniyeh's weekly Friday night speech, routinely full of pathos and battle cries against Israel, the former prime minister chose this time to emphasize that Hamas does not want a war.

Yet the cold status quo could change. Within Hamas' military wing, some are demanding the group take violent action with an "opening strike" that they hope will eventually bring about the lifting of the siege of Gaza.

There is also increasing support among ordinary Gazans for a new round of fighting, especially among those who have little to lose.

One errant Israeli shell or Palestinian mortar, will strengthen advocates for war in both camps. But a deadly accident, like a candle knocked over, can ignite the region just the same. ■

OPINION

Gerald Steinberg

The deep hatred that taints significant parts of the British left has been painfully visible for many years, but very few stood up to fight this disease. The Labour Party's recent selection of Jeremy Corbyn, whose loathing for Israel is undisguised, appeared to mark a new low point. What is often termed "the new anti-Semitism", meaning the obsessive rejection of Zionism and self-determination for the Jewish People, seemed invincible, particularly in the United Kingdom.

But these attacks crossed an invisible red line, and dozens of officials, including Ken Livingstone, the former mayor of London, were suspended due to their anti-Semitic remarks. The BBC, whose broadcasts are seen as biased against Israel, featured debates in which Livingstone and the others were ridiculed and berated. Newspapers published commentaries that condemned the anti-Israel expressions and the failure of party officials to take action. This is indeed a new and historic development.

But as the anti-Semitism is gradually being exposed and rejected, step after painful step, it's clear that this toxic political disease isn't confined to the British Labour party. The deep prejudice is reflected in many other institutions, including on university campuses and among groups claiming to promote "liberal progressive values."

Some powerful charities and human rights groups have promoted campaigns singling out Israel for sustained attack, including boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS). These groups are allied with radical Palestinians and fringe Israeli anti-Zionists, promoting false allegations of war crimes, apartheid, genocide and other outrageous and immoral claims. Largely erasing Palestinian terrorism, they repeatedly issue blanket condemnations of Israel, while, at least until recently, all but ignoring blatant atrocities and human rights violations in Syria, Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia and Libya.

In a number of cases, the new political anti-Semitism on the left merges with classical theological hatred of Jews. Medical Aid for Palestinians (MAP), which is endorsed by many public figures and receives money from Britain's Department for International Development, is very active in demonizing Israel, in co-operation with the Council for Arab-British Understanding. Swee Ang Chai, MAP's founder, is also a promoter of the anti-Semitic rants of David Duke, leader of the Ku Klux Klan.

Christian Aid, which was created to provide humanitarian assistance, runs social media attack campaigns blaming Israel entirely for Palestinian suffering. (Palestinians are treated as children who are not responsible for their actions.)

War on Want, another very powerful group, uses similar rhetoric, and Jewish Human Rights Watch filed a complaint with the U.K. Charity Commission, citing the organization's campaign of "demonization of the State of Israel," which "has no bearings on the objects of the charity."

In the case of Amnesty International, in addition to frequent war crimes accusations, a number of its officials are active in promoting hatred. In November 2012, during an intense parliamentary debate on Gaza, Kristyan Benedict, Amnesty UK's campaign manager, tweeted a "joke" based on the image of three Jewish MPs as "warmongers." John Mann MP, chair of Britain's All-Party Parliamentary Group Against Anti-Semitism, observed that Benedict had "crossed the line between legitimate criticism and anti-Semitism" and called for an inquiry into the organization.

But Amnesty leaders dismissed Benedict's offensive words as merely "ill-advised" and "not racist or anti-Semitic." Two years later, he struck again, using the term JSIL ("Jewish State in the Levant") to compare Israel to the mass public executions and beheadings of the Islamic State in Syria. Amnesty-UK also rejected urges to add anti-Semitism to its human rights agenda.

As these and other examples show, the mix of old and new anti-Semitism on the left goes far beyond the U.K. Labour Party. To truly rehabilitate themselves, these groups must close the gap between espousing progressive values and actually implementing them, starting with the immediate end to hatred of Israel and the Jewish People. This process has finally begun, but there is still a long way to go. ■

Educator pleads guilty to child porn charge

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The one-time director of Leo Baeck Day School in Toronto pleaded guilty to a child pornography charge in California, received a 100-day jail term and has returned to his native England.

David Prashker pleaded guilty in April to the felony charge of possessing child pornography. He served 100 days in county jail (before and after sentencing) and was released, Jordan Sanders, the Contra Costa County deputy district attorney assigned to the case, told The CJN in an email.

Prashker admitted in a plea agreement that he knowingly possessed "electronic matter depicting a child under 18 years of age engaged in sexual activity," prosecutors said in a statement.

Prashker, 60, is required to stay on probation for three years and register under California law as a sex offender.

Upon his release, he returned to the United Kingdom, Sanders said.

When he was arrested at his home in Lafayette, Calif., on Feb. 18, Prashker allegedly threw a laptop from a second-floor bedroom into his backyard while a search warrant was being served. Investigators found evidence of child porn on the computer's hard drive.

Prashker was also charged with attempting to destroy evidence, but that charge was dropped in the plea deal.

He served as director of Leo Baeck Day School from 2004 to 2008, when he resigned over violent and sexually explicit poetry he wrote and posted online.

Parents of Leo Baeck students had complained that the poetry was inappropriate and that posting it online reflected poor judgment. Parents were alerted to the poems via an anonymous email.

The London-born Prashker was a substitute teacher at two private schools in Contra Costa County outside San Francisco, but there was no evidence found that his activities involved students at the schools.

According to his website, Prashker is the author of 30 books, "including contemporary and historical novels, short stories, poetry, songs, plays and scholarly works, as well as being a painter, musician, singer-songwriter, the owner of the Argaman Press (his own publishing imprint), the author of TheBibleNet and the founder and CEO of the Campaign for a Charter of Human Responsibilities."

As a teacher and school administrator, he "has covered every age from nursery to adults, including day and boarding schools, religious schools, kibbutz schools, summer camps, and regular Shabbat morning Torah shi'urim for adults." ■

Comptroller wants investigation into leaked war report

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israel's State Comptroller Yosef Shapira requested that Attorney General Avichai Mandelblit launch an investigation into the leak of his secret, reportedly damming report on the state handling of Israel's 2014 war against Hamas in the Gaza Strip.

Shapira told Mandelblit on May 8 that the highly classified draft report was sent last week to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon and other government officials who served in the security cabinet at the time of the war, the Ha'aretz daily reported.

He said the premature release and publication of information from a top secret document was a criminal offence punishable by up to a year in jail.

Also last Sunday, the Knesset called for a special plenum session to address the leaked report and its findings.

The session was called after opposition lawmakers from the Zionist Union, Joint (Arab) List and Meretz parties garnered the necessary support from Knesset members. The date for the plenum discussion has yet to be set.

Meretz MK Ilan Gilon told Army Radio last Sunday afternoon that he fully expects Netanyahu to attend the session, "in order to provide the public with some answers."

According to media sources who saw the 70-page document, Shapira's report accused Netanyahu and Ya'alon of failing to provide the security cabinet with real-time updates regarding the imminent threat of war with Hamas, or the capabilities of the terror group's cross-border attack tunnels.

The prime minister and the defence minister were also said to conceal warnings from the Shin Bet security agency, which raised the potential for war with Hamas in early July 2014, according to Channel 10. The 50-day conflict, known in Israel as Operation Protective Edge, began on July 8, 2014.

Members of the security cabinet were only apprised of the Shin Bet warning once the operation was underway, the report said.

According to the Ma'ariv newspaper, among the officials hit hardest in the draft was then-IDF chief Benny Gantz, "who is exposed as a weak chief of staff who was out of touch with reality."

Netanyahu, it added, "is depicted as having no crisis management abilities."

The Yediot Achronot daily said the draft found the security establishment "did not have a comprehensive plan for dealing with Hamas' offensive tunnels" during the conflict.

Hamas' tunnels were used to devastating effect on a number of occasions during the war to ambush IDF soldiers.

In February, the comptroller's office released a statement pointing to severe failures to anticipate the tunnel threat.

"The draft as submitted points to gaps and failures, some severe, in the readiness for the tunnel threat and dealing with them," it said.

Last Thursday, May 5, Netanyahu and Ya'alon hit back at Shapira, dismissing the report as "not serious."

Sources close to the two men said they rejected the claims against them in the draft.

Yuval Steinitz, a senior Likud minister loyal to Netanyahu, said the reported findings of the report "bore no relation" to the report's true content.

"The operation was conducted with unprecedented transparency vis-à-vis the security cabinet. Over the course of the operation, Netanyahu convened the cabinet dozens of times, more than during any other [military] operation in history," a source close to Netanyahu said.

The Israeli military destroyed over 30 Hamas tunnels during the 2014 operation, and recently uncovered two sophisticated tunnels – including one last week – that lead into Israeli territory.

Following the conflict, Israel invested an estimated NIS 1 billion (approximately $340 million) into developing a detection system to locate such tunnels.

The draft report came amid fears of another conflict in the south after several days of exchanges near the border.

A Palestinian woman was killed last week when Israeli tank shells hit her home east of Khan Younis in the Gaza Strip, according to a report by the southern city's Nasser Hospital.

The Israeli fire came in response to a spate of mortar attacks on troops along the Gaza border fence since April 3. ■

Israeli Jews support pluralism and civil marriage, poll finds

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Most Israeli Jews support increased Jewish pluralism in Israel, and are in favour of the right to freedom of marriage, a survey released May 8 found.

The poll, published by The Jewish People Policy Institute (JPPI), found that more than 60 per cent of Israeli Jews back the legalization of civil marriages in the country.

Over 80 per cent said that Israeli Jews who identify as traditional, Orthodox and secular are all "equally good Jews," and 56 per cent of respondents said the government should be "much more considerate" of the views of minority groups.

Some 44 per cent said they supported the integration of non-Jews into the school system.

The study, conducted as part of the Jewish pluralism in Israel Index with the support of the Davidson Foundation, polled 1,000 Israeli Jewish adults, of whom 31 per cent described themselves as completely secular, 21 per cent secular-traditional, 23 per cent traditional, 10 per cent religious, 10 per cent ultra-Orthodox and 4 per cent liberal-religious.

The institute defined Jewish pluralism as "the condition in which Jews in Israel and abroad, from different social, ideological and religious groups, regardless of sex or ethnicity, should have an equal chance to bring their differences to the public arena."

Although most respondents indicated support for greater pluralism in Israeli society, some sharp differences remained on how increased religious freedom should be implemented in the Jewish state.

Over half of respondents said they opposed "Jews marrying non-Jews," and most also disagreed with women wearing phylacteries at the Western Wall.

The poll further found that 90 per cent of respondents reported feeling "comfortable" or "very comfortable" with themselves in Israel, though those who identified as right-wingers (22 per cent of all respondents) were significantly more likely to respond as such than left-wingers (4.9 per cent of all respondents).

The survey also examined the public attitudes and perceived contribution of the different groups and population sectors.

By a wide margin, Israel Defence Forces soldiers topped the list as contributing the most to the Jewish state. At the bottom were Israeli Muslim Arabs and the ultra-Orthodox communities, two groups who traditionally have the lowest proportional presence in the army.

In contrast, Israeli Druze, a small Muslim community whose young adults generally volunteer to serve in the IDF, ranked significantly higher on the scale of groups contributing to society.

Diaspora Jews were also viewed in a more positive light than Israelis who left the Jewish state to live abroad.

According to the JPPI, the poll, which is part of a larger work on pluralism in Israel and the Jewish people, focused on "Jewish Israelis. The index comes to provide an annual objective measurement concerning the ability of every Jew to feel at home in the Jewish state," a statement from the institute said.

According to JPPI president Avinoam Bar-Yosef, the differences in responses are representative of the ongoing debate over Israel's Jewish identity.

"The differences result from a clear majority's wish to preserve a framework of unity Jewish character of the country and the agenda of Diaspora communities, mainly liberals, who want the state to include anyone who identifies as Jewish and desires a connection to their roots," he said. ■

TJFF program examines story of Israeli cinema

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

> [Israeli cinema has] such a rich history which we don't acknowledge much.
> Stuart Hands, TJFF programmer

The programmers of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival are not just interested in exposing the work of hot new Israeli filmmakers making a mark on the world stage. They also want to invite Torontonians to travel back in time and explore the past 50 years of Israel's film history.

One of the centrepieces of the festival's 24th year is Hagiga – the Story of Israeli Cinema, which screens across two nights (May 11, 12) at Innis Town Hall.

"It is such a rich history, which we do not acknowledge much," says Stuart Hands, the TJFF program director.

"People have this understanding that [Israeli cinema] only became interesting in the past 15 years. There are all these filmmakers that came before, in the '70s or even before that… who were vital."

The two-part festival version of Hagiga was trimmed down from a more comprehensive series of episodes that aired on Israeli television in 2015.

Part 1 focuses on the major filmmakers who shook up the film industry in the '60s and '70s, including Menahem Golan, Judd Ne'eman, Ephraim Kishon and Uri Zohar.

The second chapter will focus on more contemporary figures, such as Eytan Fox, Joseph Cedar, Eran Riklis and the late Ronit Elkabetz.

Several of the films featured in this latter half may be familiar to patrons with deep ties to the festival.

"This audience has been with the festival for 24 years now, and they have developed a kind of curiosity and knowledge of all these films and actors that you see when you look at the documentary," says programmer Jérémie Abessira.

One of the earliest titles to premiere at the TJFF, which loyal festival goers may remember, was the 1994 Israeli drama Sh'Chur, which featured an Ophir award-winning performance from Elkabetz. The actor and director died on April 19 at the age of 51 after battling cancer.

In her honour, the TJFF programmer decided to add a screening of a moving documentary about Elkabetz. A Stranger in Paris, (May 12) directed by Nir Bergman, is a 50-minute documentary from 2010 about the late artist, best known for films such as Late Marriage and Gett: The Trial of Viviane Amsalem.

Hagiga airs in two parts at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

A Stranger in Paris was submitted to the festival in an earlier year, but it only found a place in the program due to her passing, Hands says.

"She's a very important icon," he says. "People who have been with the festival all these years have really become familiar with her."

Another title focused on arts in the Middle East is David A. Stein Memorial Award winner Arabic Movie (May 13). The film explores a different kind of cinephilia in Israel, but among the Arabic-speaking Sephardi and Mizrahi populations. Every Friday night, these groups would come together to watch Arabic films from Egypt.

Another title of interest is I, Dalio – or the Rules of the Game, (May 11), a 33-minute documentary about character actor Marcel Dalio. The French actor was often cast as Jewish characters in films released during the lead-up to World War II. Dalio later fled for the United States to escape the Nazi regime.

"The whole film is kind of revolving around… being Jewish and what it means for [Dalio] as an actor in France being seen as the Jew," Abessira says.

Dalio may not be a household name, but he appeared in many of the greatest films of all time, such as Casablanca, Rules of the Game and Grand Illusion. That latter title, directed by Jean Renoir, was screened earlier in the festival. Chris Faulkner, a professor who has written on Renoir's Popular Front films of the 1930s, introduced the classic wartime drama. ■

Shylock's Ghost looks at controversial character

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Before he won the Man Booker Prize, English novelist Howard Jacobson taught the works of William Shakespeare. The Bard also inspired his first book, the non-fiction work Shakespeare's Magnanimity, about four of the playwright's tragic heroes.

However, despite Jacobson's love for Shakespeare, one work was left off his syllabi and went unmentioned in his writing: The Merchant of Venice.

"It was not a play that had ever figured largely in my imagination," Jacobson says.

That may be a surprise for readers of Jacobson, who has written several fiction and non-fiction works with Jewish themes. Venice has remained one of Shakespeare's most provocative works due to the character of Shylock, the moneylender that many argue is a Jewish caricature.

Nevertheless, when publisher Hogarth enlisted various bestselling authors – including Jacobson, Margaret Atwood and Edward St. Aubyn – to reimagine Shakespeare's works in contemporary times, he re-read the play and found it suitable for a new interpretation.

Fascinated by the character, Jacobson also agreed to appear in a BBC special about Shylock with Alan Yentob.

Howard Jacobson in Venice

That documentary, Shylock's Ghost, screens at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 14, at Innis Town Hall.

Filmed last summer, the doc is an insightful and entertaining look into one of literature's most controversial characters. In the film, Jacobson and Yentob visit Venice's Jewish ghetto, where actors prepare to mark the area's 500th anniversary with a new staging of Shakespeare's play.

The timing was right for Jacobson, who was just finishing up Shylock Is My Name, his update of Venice, when he worked on the film. (That book is now available for purchase.)

Speaking to many distinguished scholars of the Bard, Jacobson admits that he thought of some new ideas for his novel inspired from their conversations.

"Of all the books I've ever written, I've never done one that kept changing itself [so much]," he says. "Shylock himself gets under your skin, and if you're Jewish particularly, you feel differently about him every day."

Shylock's Ghost, directed by Colette Camden, features interviews with various actors who have played Shylock onstage, such as Dustin Hoffman and Antony Sher.

In other scenes, literary scholars debate whether or not the play is anti-Semitic. As the documentary explains, Shylock is considered "the most odious Jew literature ever spawned." In the play, the moneylender demands to cut off a pound of Antonio's flesh if the merchant cannot repay his loan.

Jacobson says he prefers actors that show off Shylock's wit and strength. He is fond of English actor Henry Goodman's take on the character, as well as Al Pacino's depiction of Shylock in Michael Radford's 2004 screen adaptation.

"I'm more taken by those actors who make you feel the maleness of Shylock," he says. "The play is richer when we are alarmed by [him] actually, when we feel his power."

Various literary scholars argue that Venice was taking the pulse of anti-Semitism during the time of its original staging. However, that play was performed 50 times in Nazi Germany between 1933 and 1939, perpetuating the propaganda of the time.

Nevertheless, Jacobson doesn't see the play as anti-Semitic.

"People forget that these plays are plays – they are dramatic. At no point are you meant to take a side," he says.

Last year, a version of the play at Shakespeare's Globe Theatre, added a scene with Shylock's conversion to Christianity that wasn't in the original text. A filming of that production, which features Jonathan Pryce as Shylock, will show at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 15 at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema.

After studying Venice so thoroughly for his novel, and taking part in the BBC documentary, Jacobson says that if given the opportunity to teach Shakespeare again, the play would be on his syllabus.

"The play's been very badly read over the years," he says, referring to the claims of anti-Semitism that cloud how people look at the text. "Shakespeare is too good a writer for us to read a play as simplistically as that." ■

Holocaust doc gets a modern twist in festival's closing film

MICHAEL FRAIMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

On April 28, 1945, more than 10,000 refugees landed at a harbour in Malmö, Sweden. Remarkably, a Swedish National Television videographer captured their arrival on black-and-white film, and though the footage is just a few minutes long, it shows us everything we could ask for: close-ups, wide shots, frightened children, joyful mothers, smiles and waves. But on its own, the footage is an empty shell: personalities without histories, faces without names.

That's where Swedish director Magnus Gertten comes in. The closing night film for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Every Face Has a Name (May 15, 8 p.m. at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema), updates this 60-year-old footage by finding as many survivors as possible who arrived that day, showing them the restored footage on a silver MacBook, and asking them what – or whom – they remember.

There's a wonderful moment of suspense with every one. The camera lingers unflinchingly on them, their backs hunched over, eyes squinted behind bifocals, muttering to themselves as they scan the footage warily.

Then, suddenly: "That's my mother!"

Each face, as the title claims, has a name – but also a story. We meet the sweet-voiced Elsie Ragusin, an American Roman Catholic who visited her grandmother in Italy at the worst possible time and was transported to Auschwitz because the Nazis were convinced she was a spy; Philip Jackson, who helped his hardened mother in the resistance as a teenager and was decorated by the French military, only to suffer a worse fate when his own 19-year-old son died of leukemia years later; Nurit Stern, with a thick Israeli accent, who at first staunchly refuses to even look at the footage, yet winds up putting names to three unknown faces – including her own.

The film is a slow burn, with an eerie ambient soundtrack that lulls us somewhere between sleep and empathy. The cinematography and editing are cleverly done, considering what little there is to work with: they take associative cues from the subjects' words to help us understand that everyday sights may remind these survivors of terrible things.

One man mentions seeing children hanging dead from coat hooks, so we cut to a rope swing near his house; another talks about feeling weak all the time, and we immediately see a soccer goalie standing haplessly after being scored on.

Every Face Has a Name closes the festival.

Though the film essentially does the same thing nearly a dozen times, its grander cinematic narrative is tugged along by repeated shots of a modern-day Sicilian harbour. Though the details are not made explicit for a while, it's quickly obvious that Gertten wants us to be thinking about Syrian and African refugees – the thousands who have died while journeying to a better life, and the hypocrisy Europeans and North Americans flaunt whenever they reject the humanity of a certain class or race.

To be clear, I'm inferring a bit here. Gertten stops considerably short of making any sort of claim linking Jewish and Syrian refugees. Instead, he shows us the clips from Sicily, names a few Muslim refugees and ends things there.

With a running time of only 75 minutes, he certainly had room to flesh out a real argument; he could have interviewed at least one African refugee, perhaps finding some firmer narrative parallel than simply juxtaposing poor people on boats. If he didn't want to make a political film, he should have eschewed the topic altogether, instead of meekly hinting at social justice.

But if the modern-day parallel seems more an afterthought, the depth of the survivors' experiences more than compensates as an emotional core. Had he not made this film, we could have looked at that original 60-year-old footage and parsed out something of a story on our own, filling in gaps with our imaginations and other documentaries. But Gertten has brought this mere archival documentary footage to life, so that, 50 years from now, once Nurit Stern and Philip Jackson are gone, their sum existence will not be reduced to nameless faces smiling, waving, staring straight into a camera. They will have told their stories. ■

My faith gave me a change of heart over same-sex marriage

Michael Coren

My new book is entitled Epiphany: A Christian's Change of Heart and Mind over Same-Sex Marriage. Which at first glance is not the most obvious title to appeal to readers of Canada's premier Jewish newspaper. But please stay with me. The personal story here is that for many years I was known as one of the country's leading opponents of equal marriage. I was a social conservative and someone who while never intending harm did perhaps empower and enable those who did. It's something for which I am profoundly sorry and I've written and broadcast countless times over the past two years my contrition and apologies.

My personal transformation from critic to passionate friend is multi-faceted and complex but is based in faith. In my case, even though three of my grandparents were Jewish, it comes from my Christianity; I became a Christian in 1984 and have never wavered. So it was through prayer, reading of Scripture, thought and experience that I came to a new understanding and approach on this issue. It's something I thank God for every day, and this is the point. God.

Judaism is as various in Christianity in its application. Reform, Conservative, modern Orthodox, ultra-Orthodox and so on, and all have their own forms of theology regarding the gay community and same-sex marriage. A relationship with God is personal of course but that relationship has to be informed by God's word, which is revealed in the Bible.

Christians have what might be described as a sequel to what they call the Old Testament but in fact it's actually the Hebrew Scriptures that say the most about homosexuality. Mind you, it's still not much. Lesbianism is never mentioned at all and if you blink you'll miss the entire subject. Contrary to what some might tell you, homosexuality is a wafer-thin component of the Bible.

It's not for me, a Christian and a mere journalist, to instruct you in this area but some of the traditional biblical references are difficult to justify with consistency and integrity in the modern age. The Mosaic regulations had reference and relevance in their age and still provide a broad moral narrative but do any of us still observe every iota? It's surely unfair and even disingenuous then to single out some parts of holy text and not others. Some of the teachings regarding, for example, punishments for adultery or rules regarding women's rights would be considered bizarre and worse today.

Similarly with the example of Sodom and Gomorrah. While Sodom has so much to answer for regarding the treatment of gay people down the ages, when the people of Sodom's behaviour is mentioned elsewhere in the Bible it is spoken of in reference to lack of charity, cruelty to strangers and barbarism, rather than homosexuality. It's more likely an early medieval interpretation that had led many people of faith, Jewish as well as Christian, to believe otherwise.

At heart, though, is the essence of God's teaching, and that essence is love. Love for God, love for His creation and love for His creatures. A love that defies understanding but a love that in Judaism as much as Christianity is supposed to be built around treating others as ourselves.

The reality is that Jewish people have often been at the forefront of the campaign for equality and for social justice and this is true for gay rights as much as any other. More than this, while the Jewish state – Israel – may not accept gay marriage as such it is ethically progressive and socially enlightened regarding its gay citizens and a glowing example to its neighbours.

Intelligent and rational religion is under siege, by aggressive secularism on the one hand and hysterical fundamentalism on the other. Gay rights and equal marriage have become litmus tests for tolerance and understanding, and if Judaism and Christianity are to appear relevant and authentically loving to the next generation they have to reconsider some long-standing opinions and even prejudices. If Scripture were absolute about homosexuality there would, alas, be no choice. But it is not. It is largely neutral and should always be understood through the prism of contemporary knowledge, life experience and the unending, relentless, overwhelmingly joyful notion of God's boundless love. ■

Jazz singer's songs take listeners on a journey

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jazz singer Brenda Lewis' rediscovery of her voice while she was teaching English in post-Communist Czechoslovakia led to her becoming a professional singer in her late 20s.

Singing has always come easy to Lewis, who has two critically acclaimed albums to her credit and performs at top jazz clubs and music festivals across Ontario.

Lewis picks up melodies quickly and, as a young teen, could mimic the voices of Cher, Karen Carpenter and Marie Osmond. For a while, she sang backup in a reggae band, but she said she never dreamed she'd get up on stage and sing lead.

Teaching in Czechoslovakia in 1990, she brought lyrics of folk songs to class for her students to sing, and while singing along with them, she rediscovered her own voice.

"It was a very safe way of getting into singing," she said. In Czechoslovakia and then in Guelph, Ont., where she's currently based, friends asked her to sing at parties and, encouraged by the positive response, she began performing on open stages and in local clubs. Lewis started out singing folk music and country blues and then made the transition to jazz.

"I've always kept a slightly roots element to what I do, also a bit of an undertone that comes from gospel and soul," she said. Lewis is a publicist who promotes her own music and said her profile as an artist has helped her grow her public relations business. With her latest release, Far and Near, a collection of standards and songs written by Canadian artists, Lewis takes the listener on a journey.

> The album is all about travel, one way or the other.

Brenda Lewis

"I started putting songs together for the album, and once I got halfway through, I realized I had a theme. A lot of them were about faraway places, longing or places of the heart. It's all about travel, one way or the other," Lewis said.

Far and Near features several songs outside the jazz genre, written by Sarah McLachlan, Gil Scott-Heron and Jesse Winchester. Guitarist Margaret Stowe, who co-produced the CD with Lewis, reinterprets the songs in a jazz vein. One of the standards on the CD is A Nightingale Sang in Berkeley Square, a song Lewis dedicates to her parents when she performs it. Lewis said she imagines her parents, Henry and Edith, who were both veterans of the British army, dancing to it. "It's about London, England. That's where they lived after the war, when they got married," she said.

Lewis' father, born Heinz Laufer, was, at 14, one of 669 Jewish children evacuated from Czechoslovakia and sent to England in 1939 on the Czech Kindertransport organized by Sir Nicholas Winton. In 2009, Lewis met Sir Nicholas and thanked him for saving her father's life.

"It's a moment when you realize he's a just a man, of course, but a man who made a decision to do something extraordinary," she said. Lewis said it was a matter of sheer luck that her dad was chosen for the Kindertransport.

"Everyone applied to get their kids onto this Kindertransport. My grandparents applied for both of their kids to be sent and the agency that was in charge picked my dad, probably because he spoke English."

The rest of her father's family didn't fare so well. His mother, his father and his brother perished. Lewis believes in paying her dad's good fortune forward. Late last year, after struggling with what she could do to help the Syrian refugees, she co-presented and performed at a benefit concert for them in Elora, Ont. ■

Lewis is performing at 7 p.m. on May 15 at Toronto's Jazz Bistro. For more information about Lewis, visit www.brendalewis.ca. You can download Far and Near on iTunes.

Festival shows films about and by people with disabilities

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Years after the Toronto Jewish community committed to making synagogues more accessible to those who are differently abled through the annual Shabbat Itanu initiative, a "complementary, but separate" event is being held in Toronto for the first time.

The REELabilities Film Festival, founded in 2007 in New York by the JCC in Manhattan to present films by and about people with disabilities, makes its Toronto debut on May 12.

"It's in 13 cities across the U.S. and we are the first international location. We are so excited. We have 27 community partners, film festival partners and accessibility organization partners," said Liviya Mendelsohn, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's manager of accessibility and inclusion and the artistic director of the REELabilities Toronto Film Festival.

The festival is an opportunity to "tell some of these beautiful and interesting stories that haven't had as wide an audience yet," she said.

Although the film festival is new, the Shabbat Itanu event it complements is not.

The film Anita will be screened May 19.

Shabbat Itanu, held this year on May 13 and 14, is an annual event that calls on synagogues to hold inclusion-themed Shabbat services and programs to highlight the need for greater inclusion and accessibility.

Mendelsohn said there are 23 synagogues in the GTA that are marking this event in some way.

"Several shuls have community members with disabilities and disability advocates speaking on how to remove barriers and helping them figure out what the barriers are. I know a couple of shuls that are having a scholar in residence to talk about Judaism, Jewish texts and accessibility," she said.

Offering an example of one of the programs, she said that on May 14, Shaarei Shomayim will host Judge Richard Bernstein, the first blind justice elected to the Michigan Supreme Court and an advocate for disabled rights, as he shares his personal story with the congregation.

"There are some really exciting programs, and some shuls are reaching out to younger activists, but it's a great time for people with disabilities to take centre stage in their shul and talk about their experience and how the whole community can embrace difference."

Mendelsohn said the event also brings congregations together for one cause.

"It's been tremendous to watch shuls mentor each other, helping each other to do things like apply for grants to renovate their facilities… Several shuls have accessibility tips in their weekly or monthly newsletters, and it's really been wonderful to watch this organic process where people are working together and sharing across denominations, across all kinds of differences."

What brings Shabbat Itanu and the REELabilities Film Festival together is the fact that a number of congregations will buy group tickets to attend the screening of two films that touch on Jewish themes.

"Deaf Jam [May 16 at the Al Green Theatre] is about a young Israeli teen in New York who is deaf. She discovers American Sign Language poetry and enters into this slam poetry scene in New York where she meets a young Palestinian poet and they begin to make poetry together. It's a really beautiful story," Mendelsohn said.

The other Jewish-themed film, Anita, which will be screened May 19 at the Al Green Theatre, is about a young woman with Down syndrome who gets separated from her mother following the bombing of the JCC in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

"The role is played by an actor with Down syndrome… It's a journey of hers throughout the city and a coming-of-age story. It's beautifully acted."

Some of the films are presented by Jewish organizations including the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the Toronto Jewish Film Society and Reena. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A traveller in the land of cancer

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In a 2008 essay titled The Angel of Disease, poet Kenneth Sherman surveyed the field of writing that confronts illness. The essay is a somewhat dispassionate, even scholarly account of well-known works in the field: Susan Sontag's two books on AIDS and on her own cancer; poets such as Ted Hughes and Donald Hall, who apply creative response to illness; alongside darker works by the German poet Heinrich Heine and the American story-writer Harold Brodkey, who confront the nearness of death.

Dispassion is absent from Sherman's new book, Wait Time: A Memoir of Cancer. In it he provides a passionate, often pained portrait of the months in 2010, after a routine check-up helped reveal that his body harboured a malignant tumour as well as the possibility of a rib affected by cancerous growth.

Following his diagnosis, Sherman embarks on a grim adventure as he faces the possibility of death, pursues timely medical care, and struggles to contain feelings of fear and defeat by maintaining his normal, healthful activities.

One of these is writing. He maintains a notebook – a longstanding writer's habit – but Sherman's notebook of his cancer year has its own particular character. It contains "selections from the illness narratives I am currently rereading... Of course, reading and thinking about disease is oceans apart from coping with a potentially terminal condition. Once the doctor tells you you are ill, you begin to eke out your existence as a patient. Your life becomes an improvisation around the theme of illness."

The notebook also "contains drafts of poems," which he fears are "too emotional to be of substance. They resonate with self-pity and hurt..."

> Once the doctor tells you you are ill, you begin to eke out your existence as a patient. Your life becomes an improvisation around the theme of illness.

Wait Time: A Memoir of Cancer,* by Kenneth Sherman Wilfrid Laurier University Press

Wait Time is organized as a diary of the months in which Sherman confronted grave illness. Its entries are never sketchy; they indulge in no trivia or filler about routine daily life. Rather, they contain measured, intimate introspection about the practical demands of confronting cancer's threats. The disease is met, as Sherman tells it using Sigmund Freud's words, as "the unwelcome intruder."

In many ways, Sherman's story is linked with its Toronto setting. He makes his way through health services at Toronto General Hospital and Princess Margaret Hospital (PMH), where he undergoes surgery to remove the tumour and part of a rib. He provides a detailed portrait of doctors, support staff and the atmosphere of hospital rooms and corridors. And all of this evokes the strengths and flaws of the Ontario health-care system.

Wait Time is not an indictment of big city medical care, but Sherman's experience raises serious questions: "Are the cogs and functionaries who work at PMH given sensitivity training? As you sit in these crowded waiting rooms, or as you wait in line for your overdue surgery, you can't help but ask what is being done with the millions upon millions of dollars raised by Princess Margaret Hospital through its lotteries, its fundraising walks and bike rides...? How much money goes to the CEOs of our mega-hospitals and to the heads of their fundraising foundations?"

These practical questions merge with a depiction of Sherman's inner life, as he and his wife, Marie, make their way through the stages of discovery and care. One goal is greater understanding of the disease; another is an understanding of the broader social response to cancer. On this front, he considers the usefulness of Siddhartha Mukherjee's bestselling The Emperor of all Maladies: A Biography of Cancer, alongside other specialist writers' interpretations of cancer's impact.

But Sherman's instinctive response to his illness is to continue on as a poet. Some of the poems written in this vein are included in Wait Time, bringing the finished book closer to the character of the writer's notebook it is based on.

Among the impressive qualities of Wait Time is its unguardedness. Sherman describes periods when he could not write. These periods, he says, added to his "despair," because for him, "writing, the engagement with language," is a support in "times of trouble."

The conclusion of Wait Time, which a reviewer would be irresponsible to reveal, is a deeply felt appreciation of the impact of illness on human character and companionship. ■

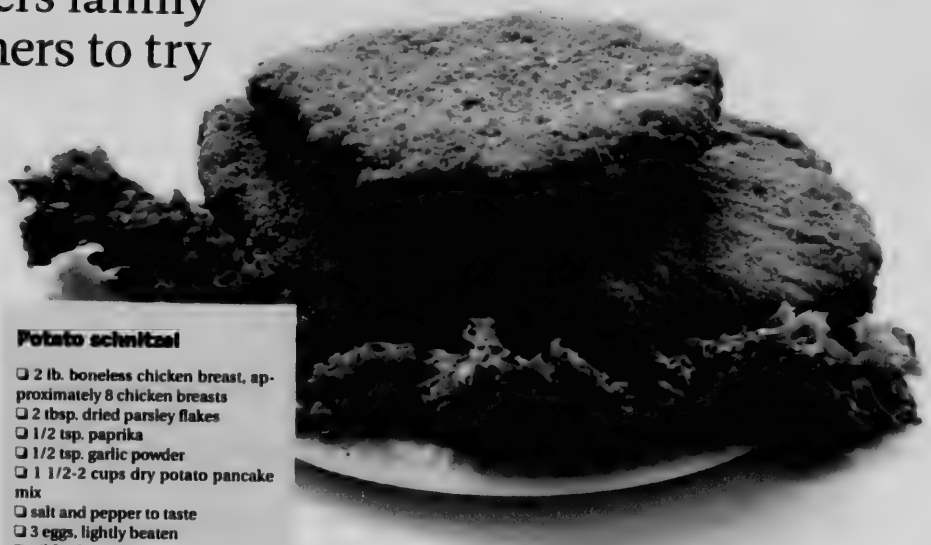
Cookbook offers family recipes for others to try

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



At the end of March, some 200 women gathered at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) for a cooking demonstration and a light meal based on recipes from Amy's Stopnicki's first cookbook, Kosher Taste (Feldheim Publishers, 2016).

She launched the book at the annual fundraiser for the Maddie Leventhal Mikvah Centre at the BAYT.

Stopnicki, an event planner and mother of four, said with the publication of Kosher Taste, she has achieved a longtime goal.

"I wanted my recipes to be out there. It's about sharing and helping and showing people that entertaining is achievable."

Organizers also prepared the food served to the women in attendance. Sonya Kaplan and Yehudit Levy, the event co-chairs; Lisa Berman and Suzanne Kaye, co-chairs of the mikvah; Kaye's daughter, Chaya Pamensky, and Stopnicki created a five-course tasting menu.

Stopnicki demonstrated how it was done as the women dined on Veggie Sticks with 3-Minute Caesar Salad Dressing, Elephant Garlic Soup, Baby Spinach and Apple Salad with Maple Vinaigrette, Spinach Pesto Stuffed Chicken, Potato Stacks, Chocolate Mousse and Mini Chocolate Biscotti.

Stopnicki said she's thrilled with the feedback she has been getting from readers. "People come up to me and say, 'These look like recipes that I can make.'

"That's what makes me happy. A lot of the recipes are ones that I've been making for years for my family. I developed these recipes and tweaked them over time."

Becoming a cookbook author is the culmination of her many years of entertaining experience, she said. "It has truly been a labour of love. So much work been put in and it feels great to finally have the final product."

Her foray into cookbook writing began four years ago when Netivot HaTorah Day School approached her about doing a cookbook. "I was excited about the idea of taking the project from start to finish."

She said it took three years for Gathered Around the Table (Feldheim, 2014) to be completed. Later the entire community was invited to a simchah-like party for a book launch that drew 400 people.

"It was a cookbook launch with pizzaz. It went very well, but I wanted to do something different this time."

Kosher Taste – it was completed in 15 months – can be found at most local Jewish stores including Israeli Source, Miriam's and Kitchen Art, as well as at Indigo Books and Music at Bayview Village.

Potato schnitzel

- ❑ 2 lb. boneless chicken breast, approximately 8 chicken breasts
- ❑ 2 tbsp. dried parsley flakes
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. paprika
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. garlic powder
- ❑ 1 1/2-2 cups dry potato pancake mix
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 3 eggs, lightly beaten
- ❑ oil for frying

Place the chicken between 2 sheets of heavy plastic (resealable freezer bags work well) on a solid, level surface. Using a meat mallet, firmly pound the chicken to a thickness of ¼-inch.

In a shallow bowl, combine parsley flakes, paprika, garlic powder, potato pancake mix, salt and pepper. Pour the eggs into another shallow bowl.

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Meanwhile, dip the chicken into the egg, then the potato flake mixture. Cook the chicken in the heated oil, turning once or until both sides are golden brown and the chicken is cooked through. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Carrot and daikon salad

- ❑ 5 to 6 large carrots, julienned
- ❑ 1 large daikon, julienned
- ❑ 3 to 4 green onions, chopped
- ❑ 3 cloves garlic, chopped

Dressing

- ❑ 1/4 cup oil
- ❑ 1/4 cup lemon juice
- ❑ 1 to 2 tsp. sugar
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

In a mixing bowl, combine the garlic and vegetables. In a small jar or cruet, combine the dressing ingredients. Pour the dressing over the salad and let it marinate for 20 to 30 minutes before serving. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Balsamic roast chicken

- ❑ 2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
- ❑ 5 onions, thinly sliced
- ❑ 1 cup balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 1/2 cup honey
- ❑ 1/4 cup soy sauce
- ❑ 5 cloves garlic, chopped
- ❑ ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 2 to 3 sprigs fresh rosemary, kept whole
- ❑ 2 chickens, cut in 8ths

In a large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat and sauté onions until they're soft. Add balsamic vinegar, honey, soy sauce, garlic, salt and pepper. Cook all the ingredients together for 5 minutes and then let them cool.

Add the rosemary sprigs and pour the mixture over the chicken. Refrigerate overnight or marinate for 1 hour at room temperature.

Preheat oven to 350. Bake the chicken in a covered roasting pan for 1 hour. Uncover the pan, baste and bake the chicken for another 20 to 30 minutes or until it is cooked through.

Remove the rosemary sprigs before serving and use them as a garnish. Makes 8 to 10 servings. ■

Local woman disappointed in her son

David Levine

After much recent speculation, sources are confirming that Rose Glassman, 71, has recently begun expressing disappointment in her son, Jeremy Glassman, a 38-year-old architect and father of three. The news shot through their tight-knit community, sparking both a furious debate and an outpouring of sympathy.

Jeremy's first indication that something was amiss came over a recent Friday night dinner, when an innocent story about a family friend took a turn.

"My mother was telling us about her friend Mary, and how her son had bought a house right down the street from his parents, and my mother turned to me and said: 'I guess being near his mother is a priority for some sons.'

"She stressed that last part – 'for some sons.'"

Jeremy says he couldn't escape the feeling that his mother was talking about his own decision to move his family to a house "11 minutes away" from his parents.

"It was almost like she wanted me to feel bad about my decisions. Why else would she put it that way?"

Suddenly, Jeremy says, he realized his mother was expressing disappointment in him. He refused to believe it, but the disbelief on the faces of his own family confirmed his fears.

Rose's disappointment in her son has shocked friends and neighbours, who describe the Glassmans as friendly and unassuming. Rose's mental health and emotional stability have become the subject of frequent debate in the community.

Ever since that first incident, Jeremy says it's as though a "switch has been flipped" in his mother's mind. Jeremy and his mother have been incapable of having a regular conversation ever since, he says, instead turning to vaguely coded puzzles.

"It's so strange and inefficient. She'll insinuate things, hint at her feelings, but she'll never say what she means. Like she wants me to figure out what she's thinking. This morning she asked 'Are you really wearing that sweater?' She knows I'm wearing it."

Most frustrating for Jeremy is the way a simple conversation can be twisted. "My wife Sharon got a promotion, and when we told my mother, she got really quiet, until I asked her enough and she told me she was disappointed because Sharon had probably already called her own mother with the news, whereas I waited four hours to tell my mother in person, which I did on purpose so she'd be the last person to know."

Rose's alleged criticism tends to focus on Jeremy's decision to move away from home, the distance between his home and his parents' place, his choice of career, his choice of spouse, the looks and intelligence of his children, and his occasional failure to fully tuck in his shirt.

Jeremy says he draws strength from the overwhelming support he's received from friends and strangers who call, write, email, and stop him on the street. Many find it hard to believe Jeremy is still close with his mother, even though her behaviour has not changed.

"Just yesterday she told me her roof is leaking. I asked if she wanted me to call someone. She said she thought I could 'take a look.' I'm not a roofer. I told her I don't have tar or shingles or a ladder, plus it's raining and also nighttime. She said 'It's not important.' But clearly it is important, or else why mention it?"

Those closest to Jeremy say the toxic exposure is taking a toll on his health and demeanour, but for him, it's the path of least resistance. "If I stopped calling, stopped visiting, stopped bringing her grandkids over, I'd feel guilty, and I'd be proving my mother right."

Though no diagnosis has been proposed at the time of publication, experts from around the world have convened to study Mrs. Glassman, and they are confident that hers is an isolated case with no chance of contagion. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen examines ways in which religious Jews ritualize Yom Ha'atzmaut
Rabbi Michal Shekel says celebrating Israel's independence is really about rebuilding ourselves
Rabbi Howard Morrison recalls the time he experienced Yom Ha'atzmaut and his bar mitzvah in Israel

Aaron Katchen

"This is the day the Lord has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it." (Psalm 118:24)

We have no shortage of disagreements in the Jewish community. And for the most part, disagreements are not a bad thing – it means people are being thoughtful about their lives. What often rankles people is when a disagreement involves something that matters, and someone else has the chutzpah to disagree.

There's a question that exists among the religious community about how to ritualize Yom Ha'atzmaut. On all of our festivals and days of importance, we say Hallel (literally: praising God), the recitation of Psalms 113-118, as a form of thanksgiving. The problem is, does Yom Ha'atzmaut qualify? Some parts of the community believe yes, others no, and some recite Hallel, but without a preceding blessing.

The "no" camp's reasons vary, from those who are not sure if God was involved in the establishment of the state to those who believe we should not move back to the land until the Messiah arrives. The "without a blessing" camp believes that there is reason to thank God for the foundation of the state, but some are either opposed to establishing new holidays/customs or don't bless when there is a neis nistar (a hidden miracle).

The final opinion (and for transparency, it's the one I hold) is that it's only through a great miracle that we have been able to return to the Land of Israel and re-establish Jewish sovereignty there. The miracle is only the start of the process, which is why the prayer for the State of Israel states "reisheet tzmichat geulateinu" – the first sprouting of our redemption. God has enabled us to return to the Land of Israel, which "is the day the Lord made" and requires recognition, praise and thanksgiving, but our work is not done, for now comes the hard work of completing our redemption. ■

One of the songs of the chalutzim (pioneers of Israel) was Anu Banu Arza. Popularized around 1930, this song concisely expressed the Zionist endeavour: we have come to the Land of Israel to build and to rebuild ourselves in the process.

While the musical output of modern Israeli songwriters is truly remarkable, it is this "golden oldie" that has been going through my mind as we celebrate Israel's 68th year in the same week in which we read Kedoshim.

Much of the focus in the latter half of Leviticus is on the Land of Israel and our relationship to it. God commands us in Kedoshim: "When you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap all the way to the edges of your field, or gather the gleanings of your harvest. You shall not pick your vineyard bare, or gather the fallen fruit of your vineyard. You shall leave them for the poor and the stranger: I the Lord am your God" (Leviticus 19:9-10).

Interestingly, the word for "your land" (artzechem) uses the plural form of "your," while "your field" (sadcha) uses the singular. Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch stresses the significance of this: "The Land at rock bottom is the land of the community… given to no one for purely exclusively selfish egoistic purposes." Our relationship to the Land binds us to members of our community, obligating us to provide for those who do not have our bounty.

This lesson is as applicable in Canada as in Israel. Our bounty may be different, but we have no less of a duty to the community. Tackling poverty in the Jewish community and beyond is founded on building a just community by providing the means for people to help themselves. The fact that we are rebuilding ourselves in the process is an added bonus. ■

Howard Morrison

Growing up near Boston, my first memory of Canada and Yom Ha'atzmaut was in 1973. My family had arranged to celebrate my bar mitzvah at the Kotel, the Western Wall, after Yom Ha'atzmaut.

There was no direct flight from Boston to Israel. The stopover was in Montreal. We were scheduled to arrive in time for the military celebration of Israel's 25th anniversary. However, our flight was delayed, and we arrived the next day.

We spent our first Shabbat at a kibbutz, and celebrated my bar mitzvah our second Shabbat in Jerusalem. At the kibbutz, we met a friendly group from Montreal. Coincidentally, the same group would stay in our hotel in Jerusalem. The Canadians were invited to my bar mitzvah at the Kotel. I will never forget that first memory of Yom Ha'atzmaut. Who would have guessed that 43 years later, I would be writing about it from my synagogue office in Toronto for the CJN?

Each year, I recite Hallel on Yom Ha'atzmaut. This is a growing practice for Zionistic religious Jews. In addition to the festivals mandated in the Torah, Hallel is traditionally recited for miraculous events in Israel. The first such post-Torah event is Chanukah. Many Jews today see parallels between Chanukah and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

I also recite a special version of Al Hanisim on Yom Ha'atzmaut, another growing practice among Zionistic religious Jews. This prayer thanking God for the miracles of the season is patterned after a similar prayer of gratitude recited on Chanukah and Purim.

Whenever I celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut by reciting Hallel (praise) and Al Hanisim (gratitude), I am spiritually transported back in time and place to the spring of 1973. I forever praise and thank God for my childhood family that introduced me to the beauty and vitality of the State of Israel and for a group of Canadian Jews I met there who celebrated my rite of passage with me.

Chag Yom Ha'atzmaut Samayach to everyone! ■

Tal Inbar: Israeli space program spreads its wings

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Israel in Space sounds like the name of a science fiction show from the 1960s, but in 2016 it's entirely real. Today Israel is one of only a few countries that can both design and build its own satellites and launch them into orbit. Tal Inbar heads the Space Research Center of the Fisher Institute for Air & Space Strategic Studies in Israel. He was in Toronto on April 12 and in Montreal April 14 as keynote speaker for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) galas, titled Israel in Space, which honoured the late astronaut, Ilan Ramon. He spoke to The CJN prior to the event.

Tal Inbar, head of Israel's Space Research Center

Only a handful of countries have a space program. Why did Israel chose to develop one?

The origin of Israel's space program is connected to the negotiations with Egypt and the withdrawal by Israel from the Sinai Desert. We wanted to ensure that the Egyptian army kept all the military agreements that are annexed to the peace accord was signed in 1979.

The only way you can verify what your neighbour is doing is from space. That was the trigger to develop our own space program.

How did it develop from there?

At the time, no one would sell to Israel anything related to space – not the launch vehicle, not the components for the satellite, and of course, not a complete satellite.

The mission was conducted by Israel Aerospace Industries (IAI), [which launched] the first satellite in September 1988. It was a technology demonstrator. Another one came two years later, and the first operational satellite was launched in April 1995. So we have had the capability to watch our neighbours since 1995 with ever-growing quality and resolution.

After the satellite was operating in space very successfully, the decision was made to embark on a new program, to develop our own communications satellite. It took a lot of years before we came up with several ideas for civilian application.

Is there now a private sector component to the space sector in Israel?

Today there are several companies. One is named SpacePharma, which is devoted to conducting experimentation in micro-gravity. You could just send your experiment to this company, and they will send it to space and give you all the results.

There is another company called Effective Space Solutions. They are developing an in-orbit services satellite. It's like if you were stuck with your car, you can call someone to tow you. This is the same, but in space.

They are developing a new micro-satellite in the range of about 200 kilograms that could be attached to another country's communications satellite. After all the fuel in a satellite is spent, the small satellite could move you out of the orbit that you are in.

Another company just developed a gel propulsion system for satellites. This company is called New Rocket.

Another company is developing very small satellites with a large inflatable antenna that will give the operators of a fleet of such satellites the opportunity to provide high speed Internet globally and other means of communications, like HDTV, by using very small and relatively cheap satellites.

Another Israeli company, named after Ilan Ramon, is called Ramon Chips. It produces computer chips for space routes.

What about SpaceIL?

SpaceIL is an initiative of several people who wanted to compete in the Google Lunar XPRIZE to land a small vehicle on the moon. The initiative was first envisioned by three young engineers, none of whom remains in the endeavour today. Today it's an initiative that is conducted and operated by the traditional space industry

The idea is to land a vehicle on the moon. They have a tentative launch date somewhere in the second half of 2017, but it might be postponed to 2018.

Is the rocketry used to put these satellites into space also Israeli-made?

Yes, it is Israeli-made, but it's not commercialized. The only user of the launch capabilities is Israel.

Where do these satellites launch from?

It's from Palmachim Air Force Base, about 15 kilometres south of Tel Aviv, by the seashore. For safety reasons, we are forced to launch to the west. We are the only country in the world that launches to the west, and we lose about one-third of the energetic potential of the launch vehicle. We don't have any choice, because we don't have very large territories we can launch from.

Does that mean your satellites have to be one-third smaller than other satellites?

It means we design our satellites to be very small, compact and light weight, with no compromise on the outcomes from the satellites.

We were the first country in the world who built mini-satellites in the range of 250 to 350 kilograms, with the performance of satellites with launch weights of about one-and-a-half to two-and-a-half tonnes. That was a revolution at the time, but during the last two decades, the entire world satellite industry closed the gap with us.

What are the challenges facing the Israeli space program?

The main challenge is budget, like everywhere else.

But the other main challenge is selling satellites to countries that don't necessarily want to tell the world that the satellite or its components are from Israel.

There are some limitations on the export of space technology. For example, if there is even $1 worth of U.S. hardware inside an Israeli satellite, you have to get permission from the State Department, and they want to give some protection to American industry.

Another challenge is that most countries today don't just want to buy a satellite. They want some technology transfer. And there are limitations that the Israeli regulator, which is the Ministry of Defence, imposes on various companies. So not any product that we can produce we are allowed to export.

Iran recently launched a missile that could carry nuclear payloads. How concerned are you?

Iran launched a nuclear-capable missile and they showed some very interesting underground facilities, silos and huge depots with dozens of ballistic missiles in each.

Also, new information came from North Korea. They just tested a new type of re-entry vehicle, which is a warhead for an almost-ICBM that has the capability of getting close to the continental United States.

The rule of thumb is that what you see today in North Korea you will see tomorrow in Iran, and we don't want to see it the next day in Israel. Iranian missile technology and space launchers originate in North Korea, and there is collaboration between the two programs. We know there are Iranians in North Korea when they conduct tests and vice versa.

Does Israel have the capabilities to deal with these threats?

We have a multi-layer defensive system, from Iron Dome to David's Sling and then Arrow 2 and Arrow 3. Arrow 3 is under an advanced state of development. We have to cope with the known ballistic threats from Hezbollah, from Syria, from Iran and from the south – the rockets which are getting very heavy with warheads from Islamic Jihad and Hamas. But we have to look at what the next generation of threats could be from Iran. And you have to keep an eye on North Korea. You have to be very alert and know what is going on in the whole spectrum of ballistic threats to Israel, and to cope with it, we have our own very sophisticated capabilities.

What is the extent of the co-operation in space between Canada and Israel?

There is co-operation with Canadian companies on next generation Israeli communications satellite, Amos 6, which is due to launch later this year.

The Canadian company is MDA Corporation, which was a major sub-contractor for the satellite. There is a memorandum of understanding between the Israel Space Agency and the Canadian Space Agency. The whole legal framework for co-operation in civilian space is ready, so Canadian companies could be part of the Israeli space industry.

If there are some investors in Canada, there are new and innovative ideas in the space field in Israel. The status of relations between Canada and Israel allows us to bypass some of the limitations with other countries. ■

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, we need passion, not stagnation

Backstory

MICHAEL DIAMOND
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We Jews insist on asking questions, and debating the answers. Throughout Jewish history our inquisitiveness, our unwillingness to simply accept that which we are told, our insistence that we be heard and that the ideas of others are deserving of our respect, whether we agree with them or not, have been a mainstay of what makes us a people.

But what happens if those who hold certain ideas or beliefs become so certain of their rightness, that they are unwilling to accept the possibility they are wrong, in whole or in part? What happens if ideas become ideologies, with a sense of permanence that does not allow for change or rebuttal? What happens if certain ideologies become the basis of movements which exclude the possibility that there may be a better way, a different approach, or an adjustment to the initial idea which may make it better?

When that happens you have stagnation. You have intolerance, anger, frustration, and sometimes violence. You lose that which is valuable about humanity because you lose the ability to grow, inquire, and evolve. And you may end up with political movements that can do a good deal of harm to others.

Unfortunately, there are an increasing number of examples of this type of ideological stagnation in the Canadian Jewish community. During last year's federal election, anyone who did not support the Conservative party was seen by many as being a traitor to fellow Jews. For too many, there was no question to be debated or discussed – there was just the Truth.

Meanwhile, south of the border, the political process has produced a crop of ideologically based politicians who, in almost every case, are supported by followers who are so sure of the rightness of their candidate's position (even those politicians who appear entirely unclear in their positions) that they will brook no compromise, and will yell, scream, spit or fight, in support of their Truth.

And then there is the ongoing divide in the Jewish community between those more traditional in their style of religious observance and those less traditional. The debate, of course, is a fair one, and offers much to teach for both positions. But to the extent that one side treats the issue as closed, and consequently degrades the other, we again have stagnation and a weakening in the social fabric of our community.

> We can be the best we can be, only if we are open to listen to others.

As we mark Israel's independence on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we remember both the miracle and the human sacrifices which led to the formation and ensure the continued survival of the Jewish state. But perhaps we should also remember that the ongoing debate which preceded Israel's independence, and which continues to be at the underpinnings of Israel's vibrant democracy, has led to a steadily evolving Israeli society, an evolution which is necessary in order to beat back both the internal and external challenges of statehood.

Without doubt, the Jewish community needs people with strong convictions and the willingness to speak out. We need passion. We need the desire to approach a question and to come up with an answer that makes sense and can be supported. But we will all most benefit if those people who would lead or be strong followers would also be open to the possibility that their research may have been flawed, that some of their assumptions may have been incorrect, or that their conclusions may lead to negative outcomes they had not considered.

We have all heard versions of the same joke: Stick 10 Jews in a room and you'll end up with 11 opinions. For our community's thought leaders, whether here in Canada or in the United States or in Israel, to be fully valuable, they need to demonstrate the humility which comes from recognizing that the "truth" is seldom static, that answers constantly evolve, and that we can be the best we can be only if we are open to listen to others, and to the respectful debates that can only lead to better outcomes for all of us. ■

Shoe flap, and Heel Hitler?

Reebok won't be selling this shoe after all.

Reebok nixes 'Israel 68' footwear

In an apparent response to a pro-Palestinian backlash on social media, Reebok announced, then quickly rescinded, plans to sell a special sneaker marking Israel's 68th birthday. On May 10, a day after Reebok Israel said it would sell a blue-and-white shoe engraved with "Israel 68" as a collector's item, the sportswear firm said the announcement was made in error and that the shoe had merely been proposed by an outside designer but not accepted. Reebok also said it avoids distributing shoes linked to national emblems or countries. Initial reports said the sneaker would be auctioned on Facebook on Yom Ha'atzmaut with proceeds going to Crossfit Without Borders, a group for people with mental disabilities.

He annoyed more than his girlfriend

A Scottish man was arrested after a video of him teaching a dog to make a Nazi salute and respond to the phrase "gas the Jews" sparked outrage among U.K. Jewish groups. Markus Meechan, 28, was detained on suspicion of committing a hate crime and spent a night in jail, the Daily Mail said May 9. He posted a video titled "M8 Yur Dugs A Nazi" (Mate, your dog's a Nazi). In the clip, which received more than 1.6 million views, Meechan said he trained his girlfriend's pug as a joke. "My girlfriend is always ranting and raving about how cute and adorable her wee dog is, and so I thought I would turn him into the least cute thing that I could think of, which is a Nazi," he told viewers. He filmed the dog perking up to the phrase "gas the Jews" and raising its right paw to the phrase "Sieg heil" in a speech by Hitler. He later apologized, saying he meant no offence and only wanted "to annoy my girlfriend."

School's secular studies found wanting

A chassidic boys school in London has been ordered to stop accepting new students until it starts teaching about LGBTQ issues and stops covering images of women in short sleeves in books. The Beis Aharon Trust, which runs the school, is appealing a state education watchdog decision that said the school is violating educational standards and doesn't prepare its 342 students "to enter modern British society." The school passed inspection six years ago, but failed in 2014 after a tougher ratings regimen was adopted. It had pledged to beef up its secular studies, but reportedly hasn't done so. ■

Letters to the Editor

Get out of town!

Kudos to Daniel Held for addressing the pressing issue of affordability in Jewish neighbourhoods ("Get out of town! It might be all you can afford," April 28).

The high cost of living Jewish (specifically an observant lifestyle) with skyrocketing rents and home prices, as well as day school tuition, synagogue membership, camp, etc. has barely been addressed by the community.

While it's true that our communal priorities should continue to focus on the poorest and neediest among us, stagnant household incomes in the face of high costs create a situation where Jewish observance, for some, has become a luxury. Creative thinking is indeed required.

B'Tselem defence hypocritical

Brian Rothberg's letter to the editor ("In defence of B'Tselem," April 29) decries the questioning of B'Tselem's motivation, and labels that as slander.

He then proceeds to slander Israel, claiming, without specification, that many of its current political and military activities lack moral legitimacy. For good measure, he ends his missive with a final gross slander that Israel is a state without civil or human rights. Rothberg should consult the meaning of being hoisted on his own petard.

UJA must change priorities

Jeffrey Stutz's column suggests that grandparents help pay for their grandchildren's Jewish education (April 28).

While it is laudable when grandparents choose to help their children with the high cost of day school, it is not their responsibility to do so. Many of our parents are on fixed incomes and do not have cash to spare.

A solution that I have yet to see proposed is the reallocation of funds by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. In 2015, the projected campaign total was $61 million. Jewish education received 26 per cent of that. Support for Israel and overseas received 32 per cent.

I am a firm believer in creating a strong connection to Israel, however, I think that it is time for us to recalibrate our thinking. Israel is not the dependent country that it once was. UJA needs to understand this and readjust its priorities.

The staggering cost of Jewish education is not the only crisis at hand. Housing costs are astronomically high. For many, it is impossible to come up with a down payment on a home. What about those for whom a Jewish education and housing is simply a pipe dream?

While I have no doubt that the money being sent to Israel is well spent, and certainly it is our responsibility to do what we can for the Jewish state, we have serious problems here at home that must be addressed, and quickly.

Schulich misses the point

Seymour Schulich claims that if only Jews shunned the accoutrements that made them look overtly and obviously Jewish, they would be able to "fit in with the majorities" as he did, and all would be well at York University, as well as in the wider world ("Jews should stop 'whining' about York U, benefactor says," May 12.)

His reasoning reminds me of the thinking that was prevalent among German-born Jewry prior to the Nazis' rise. German Jews, who were very assimilated, were alarmed when the Ostjuden, Jews from eastern Europe, started showing up in Germany. These Ostjuden, who were fleeing pogroms and other forms of oppression, tended to be far more observant, and therefore looked the part, a sight that prompted the assimilated Jews to fear that they would be lumped in with their more "backward" brethren.

We all know the horrific story of what came next. The tyrant who took over Germany didn't much care whether you were a fine, upstanding German Jew who knew how to "fit in" or you were one of the more Jewish-looking Ostjuden. As far as he was concerned, a Jew was a Jew, and all were deserving of eradication.

It is shocking, and I must say, more than a little saddening, that a man of Schulich's eminence seems oblivious to that lesson.

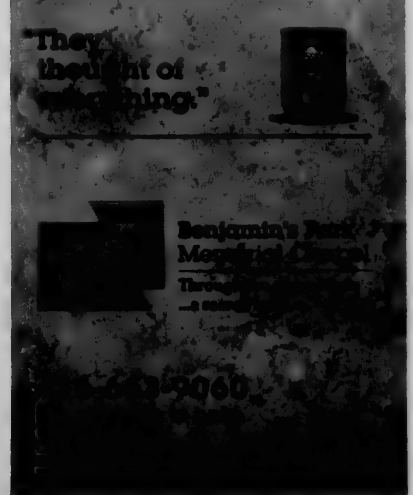
We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. They helped us fulfil every sacred rite, from Shmira to Shiva. Our father was never left alone, and neither were we. Thank you Benjamin's for keeping the light alive.



RABBI 2 RABBI

Who are Israel's true heroes?

Are they the ordinary people who find superhuman strength to celebrate life after tragedy, or those who try to seek justice and protect the nation's soul?

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: Shalom from Israel. My Jerusalem hotel is just a short walk from the Liberty Bell Park, where the mitzvah is written on the replica bell: "Proclaim liberty throughout the land" (Leviticus 25:10). If Israel is to fulfill Isaiah's call to be a "Light unto the nations," (Isaiah 49:6) her people must "pursue justice" (Deuteronomy 16:20) and passionately so.

Beyond the noble soldiers of the IDF, who are the Israeli heroes you have come to know and admire?

Rabbi Fishman: If most of the time we teach from books and texts, the very Land of Israel itself and its people are those who have the most to teach us. We just have to be listening. This past November, I attended the wedding of Sara Littman and her groom, Ariel, in Israel. Sara's father and brother had been tragically murdered just days before the wedding. So you ask who inspires me? The ordinary people of Israel, who, beset by tragedy, find the superhuman strength to celebrate life.

Rabbi Splansky: I'm here with a congregational social justice trip, and we visited Yad b'Yad, the extraordinary bilingual school in Jerusalem where Jewish and Arab children are taught by Jewish and Arab teachers.

We met two representative parents from the school – Elana, a modern Orthodox woman from Toronto, and Fadi, a Christian Arab man from Haifa. They remembered when the school was struck by Jewish arsonists, and when a neighbourhood bus was the target of Muslim terrorists. Fadi said, "When all hell breaks loose out there, this school is where we want to be."

These parents are taking real cultural risks in order to prepare their children for respectful and successful coexistence.

Rabbi Fishman: There is no doubt in my mind that if peace in Israel will only come about by bringing ordinary people on both sides of the conflict face to face with one another. To meet the "other" and talk together, to find commonality and a shared humanity is the only way.

Yet I find it discouraging that so much interfaith dialogue and promotion of co-existence between Israelis and Palestinians is initiated by Israelis and their supporters in the Diaspora. Perhaps I am mistaken, but I feel that the pull toward co-existence is somewhat lopsided.

Everyone knows that both sides will benefit from peace. But have we reached the point where both sides wish to mutually recognize one another and indeed live side by side?

Rabbi Splansky: Southwest of Jerusalem, Beit Shemesh has become a flashpoint in the fight for women's rights. Miriam, an Orthodox woman from New York, monitors the streets for illegal signs instructing women not to linger on the sidewalks in front of synagogues and to dress according to a strict modesty code. The word "women" was blackened out from the sign for the Women's Health Clinic, as if it were a dirty word. I also count Miriam among Israel's champions of justice.

The Canadian Jewish community is devoted to protecting the body of the State of Israel. Our people give generously to build hospitals, bomb shelters and army bases. But how can we also protect the soul of Israel? As our bus winds its way through the Judean hills and wadis, I hear the echo of the prophet Amos, saying, "Let justice flow like a mighty stream" (Amos 5:24).

Rabbi Fishman: While you hear Amos I hear Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, who once wrote: "We are great and our faults are great, and therefore our problems great, and great are our consolations." Although our troubles may be immense, we are reminded that so too will our consolations be great as well. When everything finally reaches its completion, our joy and true celebration arrive.

I believe it is meritorious to offer donations from the Diaspora, yet I feel that it may be overreaching to suppose that we can "protect the soul of Israel." I can't put myself in an Israeli's shoes. National conscription for teenagers, living with war and terror or the threat of annihilation – such a lifestyle impacts those in the country that we in the West may not fully appreciate.

There is certainly much still to be achieved in Israel, yet can we "outsiders" really tell them how to do it? Those privileged to live in the land are truly the shapers of Israel's soul. ■

Noa, Tony Kushner and the politics of art

Two public disagreements in the Jewish community came to a head last week, and in the aftermath, the question is how best to avoid a repeat performance in the future, or if that is even possible.

Last Wednesday, May 11, in Vancouver, a sold-out crowd of nearly 1,200 gathered to hear Israeli singer-songwriter Achinoam Nini, known as Noa, perform at a Yom Ha'atzmaut event sponsored by the city's Jewish federation. The event, however, was not without controversy, after the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) withdrew as a sponsor in February over Noa's left-wing politics. While allegations that she supported the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel were quickly rebuffed, JNF Canada CEO Josh Cooper nonetheless told The CJN at the time: "The entertainer that has been hired does not reflect nor correspond to the mandate and values of JNF of Canada."

After JNF pulled out, Israel's embassy in Ottawa and consulate general in Toronto stepped in. Noa, aware of the controversy in Vancouver, appeared relieved that the event went ahead, writing on Facebook when she arrived in Vancouver: "After all the harrowing events leading up to this concert, I am so thrilled to be here and truly grateful to the Jewish federation for not folding and the Israeli ambassador for supporting!" (For more on this story, see page 16.)

Two days earlier in Toronto, acclaimed American Jewish playwright Tony Kushner made an appearance at the Panasonic Theatre for an event sponsored by the Koffler Centre for the Arts. And as with Noa's performance in Vancouver, Kushner's Toronto engagement became a lightning rod for debate in the Jewish community after UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, a Koffler Centre sponsor, distanced itself from the event over Kushner's affiliation with Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP), the U.S.-based organization that supports the BDS movement. While Kushner sits on the board of JVP, he has publicly stated that he is against BDS.

Prior to arriving in Toronto, the Angels in America author accused UJA of "McCarthyism," and during the event he lashed out again. "The UJA, in deciding that this event was too dangerous for Jews to listen to, is upholding a fantasy version of the State of Israel and a fantasy version of Israeli policy," he said.

In response, UJA president and CEO Morris Zbar told The CJN, "Mr. Kushner sits on the advisory board of a leading BDS organization in the United States. That is his right. And UJA has the right to affirm our fundamental principles and reject BDS in all of its forms." (For more on this story, see page 30.)

Jewish organizations have every right to distance themselves from public figures whose political positions don't jibe with the views of their supporters and constituents. The same, of course, goes for individual members of the community, who are free to stay home or to organize their own events instead. Still, there is undoubtedly something special about Jews coming together publicly, whether it's to celebrate the State of Israel's independence or to experience a world-famous artist. But as last week's events in Vancouver and Toronto seem to suggest, sometimes that might not be in the cards. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

Why I read the Talmud

Edward Trapunski

Every second Tuesday evening at 8:30 I turn on my computer to study Talmud over Skype with a group of five people that comes mostly from the egalitarian First Narayever Congregation I belong to in Toronto.

I don't do it for religious reasons. Although theoretically I knew what the Talmud is, I had a secular Yiddish upbringing with respect for Jewish practices, but no real deep understanding.

I wanted to get more of an insight behind the rituals I sometimes practised but didn't quite comprehend. I wanted the challenge of following through on something spiritual and intellectual every day. I started by reading daf yomi every day. Every morning I would get an English translation of that day's Talmud page from Daf Notes and every evening I would read it, whether it made sense to me or not.

Daf yomi, a page a day, has been credited with making Talmud study accessible to Jews like me who are not Torah scholars. The process was generated by Rabbi Meir Shapiro as a way for Jews to collectively read all 2,711 pages of the Babylonian Talmud one day at a time. By following the sequence, the entire Talmud is completed in a cycle of seven years and five months. The first cycle of daf yomi began on the first day of Rosh Hashanah 5684, Sept. 11, 1923. I began with the start of the cycle on Aug. 1, 2012.

With holidays and family obligations, every day was a heavy commitment and I fell behind. Catching up was a struggle. Then in 2013 I discovered a notice in the synagogue bulletin inviting participants for daf shevui. The pace is slower, covering one page of Talmud per week instead of one a day. The group meets every two weeks, covering two pages. They say Talmud is always best learned in a group and my study partners are literally and figuratively on the same page. We take turns leading the discussion and sharing what we know.

The Talmud can still act as a guide as long as you see it as a living document, the author writes. WIKICOMMONS PHOTO

> What I want to get out of reading the Talmud is the understanding, not the strict adherence, and the context for the life I live.

The Talmud is a living document that was written at the time of the first Diaspora, when the Romans drove the Israelites out of Israel. Jerusalem was the religious capital for the Jews. The Temple was its core and the rites and rituals all took place at the Temple. When the Romans destroyed the Temple the Jews were left without a place to sacrifice animals and other Temple rites mentioned in the Torah and had to find new ways to worship.

Between about the year 200 and the year 500 CE, the Jews were in exile in the towns and villages near Baghdad in ancient Babylon. The sages needed to develop a code of conduct based on the Torah that went beyond Temple practices. They had to create a framework for Jews to maintain their own identity and religion while at the same time living in harmony in a society which was not their own.

Eight hundred years ago, Maimonides theorized that many Jewish laws in the Talmud were instituted to distinguish Judaism from paganism. He insisted that trying to explain Jewish law doesn't undermine the authority of the law. Understanding the rationale behind the law doesn't compromise obeying the law. Studying the laws, he held, leads to keeping them.

We live in a different kind of Diaspora in the 21st century in Canada, but we have equal challenges about how to live our lives as Jews. The Talmud can still act as a guide as long as you see it as a living document, not something to be obeyed without questioning. For example, the tractate my group is currently studying is Ketubot, and the page I recently led is about whether a young girl should be stoned or strangled for a sexual indiscretion. In the modern age we don't do either, so the discussion is moot. But the system of logic the ancient rabbis used to arrive at their conclusions is what is brilliant. What I want to get out of reading the Talmud is the understanding, not the strict adherence, and the context for the life I live.

At the rate I'm going I should be finished my first run-through of the Talmud in about 49 years. Then I can start again. If you ask me then I might be able to tell you how much I understand. ■

What's a kosher foodie to do?

Dietary restrictions make it hard to enjoy a good meal. But it's not impossible, as DANIEL KOREN found out

A few months ago, a conversation on Jewish news and politics with a few of my peers turned to a topic I thought would be far less polarizing: food. I quickly learned, however, that people take their culinary exploits as seriously as they take their politics.

"You can't be a kosher foodie," one friend said.

I was stumped. "Why not?"

"Too many restrictions," he replied. "You can't try all the new food trends and techniques."

I pondered this for a moment before deciding to investigate. A quick Google search belied his claim.

Not only are there thousands of kosher foodies out there, but kosher food itself has experienced nothing short of a revolution over the past decade, catching up to trends in the wider culinary world.

The term "foodie" was first coined by American restaurant critic Gael Greene in a June 1980 edition of New York magazine. It gained popularity in culinary circles and continued to grow through the 1980s and 1990s.

Being a kosher foodie is not so impossible thanks to the wide variety of cuisine and recipes now available. LESLIE PEREZ PHOTOS

Today, thanks to popular social media platforms such as Facebook and Instagram, many argue that foodie culture has reached dizzying new heights.

But what of Jewish foodies, and specifically kosher foodies? Do the dietary restrictions that come with being kosher actually make it impossible to be part of the foodie tribe? Can one be kosher and a foodie?

Food enthusiasts who spoke to The CJN seem to be in agreement: yes.

"A foodie is someone who's thinking about dinner while they're eating their lunch," says chef Bob Blumer, host of Food Network programs like The Surreal Gourmet and World's Weirdest Restaurants. "Being a foodie is maximizing the pleasure you get from what you're eating, regardless of what your restrictions are. If you're a celiac and you can't eat wheat, that doesn't mean you can't gain pleasure from food and go out of your way to make everything you can eat delicious."

It's a common sentiment among food enthusiasts, kosher and otherwise.

"A foodie is someone who cares about food quality, ingredients, process, experience, and everything that goes along with it," adds Dani Klein, 33, founder of YeahThatsKosher.com, a blog for kosher travellers. "There are kosher foodies, halal foodies, gluten-free foodies, organic foodies, lactose intolerant foodies, vegan foodies, carnivore-only foodies, etc. Just because one has a restriction doesn't mean they can't care about the quality."

"Food restrictions might make a kosher (or other) foodie limited in terms of what we can have, but that doesn't mean we are not lovers of good food," Klein says. "Thanks to the web, there's increased awareness of many hard-to-find kosher options in cities all over the world."

The Internet has also enabled the kosher foodie revolution in other ways. It has increased awareness about kosher food in general – on Instagram, the hashtag #kosherfood has been used 270,000 times – but it's also enabled a digital community of devout kosher foodies who share recipes, photos, and ideas with one another, thanks to a mutual, and delicious, common bond.

Montrealer Leslie Perez, founder of the blog EveryDay Kosher, says the last five years in particular have seen an explosion in Jewish food culture. "Jewish food finally has a voice, and it is influencing others in ways we could have never imagined. Through social media, we are connected to Jewish bloggers and foodies from around the world, from Texas to Morocco, and what unites us is that we are Jewish, love expressing our culinary art, and feed into that passion together as we share it."

In Toronto, the community of kosher food enthusiasts is also on the rise.

Eran Marom, a founder of Mobius Culinary Labs, an R&D centre that develops new methods in cooking, attributes the rise of the kosher food scene in Toronto to a thirst for knowledge, and loyalty.

Making Hatikvah an anthem for all of Israel's citizens

Mira Sucharov

With Liberal MP Mauril Bélanger's private members' bill seeking to change the lyrics of O Canada having advanced to its second reading, I am thinking about another anthem close to many CJN readers' hearts: Hatikvah. With Yom Ha'atzmaut having recently passed, the content of Hatikvah deserves some reconsideration.

Bélanger's amendment would make the Canadian national anthem more gender inclusive, changing "in all thy sons command," to "in all of us command."

As reported by CBC News, Bélanger said, "As Canadians, we continually test our assumptions, and indeed our symbols, for their suitability." He continued: "Our anthem can reflect our roots and our growth." It's a statement that is rife for comparing with the Israeli experience. Israel's Jewish state-building origins have long been challenged by the country's democratic requirements.

When it comes to inclusiveness, Bélanger knows of what he speaks. Over the last several months, Bélanger has been an especially unifying figure in the corridors of Canadian power, having been recently diagnosed with ALS. Not long ago, my own synagogue in Ottawa honoured him in a highly moving ceremony that easily transcended whatever residue of partisan divisions may have remained after what was an unusually divisive Canadian election.

Despite being written in the highly gendered language of Hebrew, ironically, Hatikvah doesn't suffer from gender exclusion (its gender inflections are mostly in the neutral "we" form). But there is a different gap in its inclusiveness: the 20 per cent of Israeli citizens who are Palestinian. Reports about swearing-in ceremonies of Knesset members or Israeli judges from time to time include a mention of a Palestinian honoree walking out or simply refusing to sing.

Writing in the Forward in 2012, Philologos (a pseudonym for Hillel Halkin) proposed changing Hatikvah's lyrics to make them more inclusive. "It's unacceptable to have an anthem that can't be sung by 20 per cent of a population," Philologos wrote. "Permitting [the minority] to stand mutely while others sing is no solution."

Philologos' fix is simple. Change "Yehudi" (Jewish) to "Yisraeli" (Israeli), and "le'tzion" ("to Zion") to "le'artzeinu" (to our land). Close the song with "in the city in which David… encamped."

It's an idea that is top of mind for Israel's Arab MKs, such as Yousef Jabareen, who told me in a 2015 interview that he believes Hatikvah should be adapted "to accommodate both national groups." He added, "The Arab minority are not just another minority. They are a native minority. They were there before the establishment of the State of Israel."

When thinking about any type of policy change, it's important to consider who stands to gain and who stands to lose. Given that a recent Pew poll found that 79 per cent of Israeli Jews feel they "deserve preferential treatment," it's clear that Jewish Israelis are comfortable with their position of privilege – whether legislative or symbolic – in Israel. It stands to reason that any erosion in perceived privilege might be seen as a threat.

Israeli Jews – especially the solid majority who crave "preferential treatment" – may not embrace these sorts of changes. Neither, when it comes to changing O Canada, do some Conservative MPs, citing no need to bend to "political correctness," as Larry Maguire said. Another MP, Kelly Block, said she does "not believe the anthem is sexist," according to CBC News.

However, there is something powerful about allowing for expanded boundaries of inclusion. Further enfranchising those who feel excluded can help buttress the institutions that constitute the state. And the costs would be relatively low.

By their design, national anthems are meant to express the will of the polity. Those who wield power might want to think about the effects of the content of national symbols on those who don't feel represented by them. When it comes to nation-building, casting a net that extends to the edges of the polity bears fruit for democratic functioning and civic identity. ■

UNESCO resolution disfigures Jewish, and western, history

Mordechai Ben-Dat

One would think, rather reasonably, that an organization whose mission is "to contribute to the building of peace, the eradication of poverty, sustainable development and intercultural dialogue through education, the sciences, culture, communication and information" would care about conveying truth.

Normally, one would think that.

But if you did, you would be wrong. At least insofar as UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, is concerned. The words of its mission statement, reproduced above, have been rendered meaningless. They are no longer a statement of high purpose, but rather a cloaking slogan. They cleverly hide sinister motives and malign behaviour.

No other conclusion makes sense in light of the resolution UNESCO's executive board adopted last month that stripped the Temple Mount in Jerusalem of any historical, theological or cultural connection to the Jewish People.

The resolution was a hodge-podge of condemnations against the Jewish state, which is referred to throughout the document as "the occupying power." UNESCO's executive board condemned the Jewish presence and activities on the Temple Mount, in Hebron and at the tomb of Rachel, all of which are identified only by their Arabic names. The resolution also mentions Gaza.

As Alan Baker, Israel's former ambassador to Canada, wrote in a sharp rebuke of the resolution, UNESCO "pointedly and deliberately denies, ignores, and seeks to delete from history, any historic, cultural and religious link between the Jewish People, the Jewish religion and Jerusalem, including specifically its holy religious site of the Temple Mount and the Western Wall, the Machpela Cave in Hebron and Rachel's Tomb near Bethlehem.

"It ignores and denies the age-old indigenous Jewish historic linkage of the area to Judaism, Jewish history and religion and ignores the existence of the remnants of Jewish holy sites and the fact that this area is universally recognized by all as 'Temple Mount,' attesting to the fact that this was indeed the site of the Jewish Temples, and as such the cradle of all Jewish existence and history."

In his commemoration of Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pointed out the true essence of the travesty perpetrated by the UNESCO executive board.

"Pay attention to what is happening here. A global organization responsible for preserving history is offhandedly rewriting a basic fact of human history. This is willful ignorance. Even worse, it is an addiction to a lie and its dissemination around the world until it is accepted as fact. This is precisely how Jew haters have acted throughout the ages."

But, of course, this was the aim of the countries – Algeria, Egypt, Lebanon, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, and Sudan – that put forward the resolution. Their intention is to place on the record of international institutions that are considered credible by most people worldwide a falsified history of the Jewish People, a history bereft of a Jewish presence in ancient Israel and an ancient Israel bereft of its Judaism.

However, to deny the presence of Judaism in ancient Israel is also to deny the presence of Christianity there. If there is no Jewish history in Jerusalem, there is no Christian history. Period.

By altering Jewish history, the supporters of this UNESCO resolution are altering, indeed disfiguring, western history, too. This may not bother the Muslim-majority countries who were among the 33 states that approved the resolution. But it should have bothered France, Russia, Spain and Sweden, who also voted for the resolution. In so doing, they effectively repudiated their own heritage, their own historical, theological and cultural origins.

But at what cost to them?

The six countries that opposed the resolution - the United States, Estonia, Germany, Lithuania, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom – understand that the hatred directed at the Jewish state ultimately rebounds against them, too. ■

Solving the day school tuition crisis a question of will

Rabbi Jay Kelman, CPA, CA

I write these words from Israel on the eve of Yom Hazikaron, the saddest day of the year, when we remember the 23,447 casualties of war and terrorism. It's immediately followed by Yom Ha'atzmaut, the happiest day of the year. This roller-coaster of emotions reflects Jewish history, with its tragedies and moments of triumph. Israel is where tomorrow's Jewish history is being made today. Only here is Judaism more than a religion. It's a way of life for a reborn nation.

As a sovereign state, Israel has the opportunity to deal with issues that, while central to Judaism, have lain dormant for centuries. Economics, social welfare, taxation, health care, freedom of the press, criminal justice, and transportation are some of the issues the Jewish state grapples with.

We can remove the dust from volumes of Jewish teaching that are now most relevant. Walking the streets of modern-day Israel, one begins to see the fulfilment of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook's dream that "the old will be renewed, and the new will be sanctified."

A Jewish state means a publicly funded education system. I would argue that one of the reasons we have a state today is because throughout our long sojourn in the Diaspora, Jewish communities created publicly funded school systems.

Jews today are wealthier than any other generation in Jewish history. It's therefore even more tragic to witness rampant assimilation, much of which would be avoided if day schools were expanded. Sadly, while many would have little interest in Jewish education even if it were free, for many, the main barrier is cost, which for high school is approaching $30,000 a year in Toronto. We can and must do better.

Throughout the 1990s and the first decade of this century, few paid attention to the increasing cost of Jewish education, as enrolment was rising. But since the financial crisis hit in 2008 and costs reached a breaking point, there have been substantial decreases in enrolment, to the point where the sustainability of Toronto's day school system in its current form is in serious doubt.

I was gratified to see that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently included among its top priorities making day school affordable for middle income families, and given the costs of tuition for three or four children, a family income of $300,000 may barely qualify as middle class.

A recent survey by federation found that 75 per cent of parents said cost is a significant factor in deciding whether to send children to a Jewish high school. And for those whose day school education for their children will end after Grade 8, 29 per cent said they'd consider high school if tuition were lowered by 20 per cent. Drop it by 30 per cent, and the number greatly increases, since the increase in tuition compared to the cost of elementary school would be negligible.

To this end, federation is spearheading a pilot project that gives interest-free loans for up to one-quarter of high school tuition fees.

It's only because of financing – with interest – that most can afford homes or cars, and financing education is common at the university level. The time has come to do so at the high school level, which would allow many to get a Jewish education they otherwise couldn't afford and wouldn't affect the tax receipt parents receive.

This is something we should all embrace, but it's only a first step. Our goal must remain capping tuition at 10 per cent of family income, regardless of the number of children in the system.

When Theodor Herzl said "If you will it, is no dream" regarding the establishment of the State of Israel, it took much more than will, but lowering tuition to 10 per cent of income requires no more than having those blessed with wealth to dream a little bigger.

Our children are counting on you. ■

Remembering our heritage, both personal and national

Norma Baumel Joseph

This is the season of memorials, of days and moments that spark our most cherished memories. We hold Yizkor ceremonies in synagogues on Passover and Shavuot, and Yom Hazikaron commemoration events. We celebrate Mother's Day and Israel Independence Day, and recall all those occasions that retain our history, both personal and national.

It seems natural and important for us to keep these events as sacred memorials, as reminders of our past without which our familial and national legitimacy is uprooted. Identities are contingent on self-development as well as historical experiences. We need these events and these rituals, because they enhance our lives and enable us to hand over a powerful heritage to our children.

For myself, I admit to missing the significance of these events until I longed for my own parents. At that point, 15 years ago when my father died, I finally got it. I finally understood the importance, the overwhelming drive to memorialize.

Every year at Yizkor, or when I say Kaddish, I think about my parents' gifts to me. I try to remember the good times, the joys and the values, the Torah and the dancing, the food and the friends, the family and the jokes. Did I pass them on? Was I able to capture the fullness of our tradition and its grandeur for my own children? That's the question.

My mother came from Hungary, my father from Vishnitz – such a large distance, geographical and cultural, to traverse. When I was young, I didn't appreciate it at all, so I didn't get enough of/ from them. When I grew up and had my own family I wanted and needed more. But still, I wasn't fully aware of how much there was to learn from them and from their ties to our heritage. But by then, it was almost too late.

We memorialize them because we need their life, their neshamahs, to infiltrate and enliven ours. We as a collective live off their experiences, their contributions and their wisdom. There is so much to gain from the past, from knowledge of its most intimate details. But we wait too long to ask the questions. We think we know it all in the generalizations. But life is lived and experienced in the minutiae only. Our parents know the specifics that we're too impatient to learn from. Pity us.

> Every year at Yizkor, or when I say Kaddish, I think about my parents' gifts to me.

My parents had perfect vision. (Of course, they wore glasses.) They had a vision of perfection that dominated their interactions. They demanded it of themselves and of us, their children. They believed in honesty, trust, responsibility, loyalty, family and hard work. They were proud American Jews and saw no contradiction or tension in those allegiances. They both worked so hard to send us to yeshiva, to give us the best education.

My parents were believers in the best sense of the word. Yes, they had doubts about many things. But they taught us to trust and to give. Tzedakah was an ever-present and ultimate value. You always gave, no matter what. And you always trusted. I was always suspicious. Not my parents. They weren't naive, but in some strange circular fashion, their belief built upon a love that emanated out of trust. Or the love came first, and that led to trust, which enabled belief.

I'm not sure which came first or whether any of these were causative or collateral damage. I do know that for my parents and their generation of immigrant Jews, America, God and family all came together in one sacred package. They trusted the vision of the Torah, of the Democratic Party, of the founding fathers, and of my teachers. I would wish for their guidance now. I do see them smiling at the wonderful accomplishments of my children. I see them basking in their glory – seeing the continuity from their world through to their grandchildren. For theirs was truly, a wonderful heritage to remember and pass on. ■

Comedian forced to return to France by border agents

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

French comedian Dieudonné, who has a lengthy criminal record for hate speech and incitement, was refused entry to the country on May 10 by Canada Border Services agents shortly after his arrival at Trudeau Airport from France that afternoon.

His defiant attempt to deliver his scheduled performance in Montreal the next day via videoconference from France did not happen, after the place where he booked space for an audience, the Evo Montreal student residence on Sherbrooke Street, cancelled that reservation at the last minute.

Dieudonné was scheduled to give 10 solo shows at a Montreal art gallery beginning tonight, but the owner of the venue said he has cancelled the shows after the comedian was turned back.

Dieudonné was also booked for two shows in Quebec City and a final one May 18 in Trois-Rivières.

Just hours before Dieudonné M'bala M'bala, which is his full name, flew out of France May 10, he was convicted on yet another hate-related charge by a Paris court and handed a two-month suspended jail sentence and a 10,000-Euro fine.

It concerned his show last year La Bête immonde, which was found to be racist and inciteful, specifically for its treatment of Jews.

Dieudonné, 50, has received some 15 convictions over the past several years in France, as well as Belgium. In 2014, he was banned from entering the United Kingdom to perform out of concern for public safety.

He is infamous for ridiculing of the Holocaust and describing Jewish conspiracies and nefariousness, as well as for having expressed empathy for the terrorists who committed the murders at the Charlie Hebdo magazine and a kosher supermarket last year in Paris. His comments have been made not only in the form of satire on stage, but in other public platforms.

Canadian Jewish groups had urged that Dieudonné be barred from the country. B'nai Brith filed a formal complaint with the Canada Border Services Agency (CBSA) and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs pressed federal authorities to recognize that Dieudonné's humour has long crossed the line from comical to criminal.

Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre stated firmly that the Frenchman was not welcome in his city, although Quebec City Mayor Régis Labeaume refused to condemn him.

On May 9, Conservative immigration critic Michelle Rempel called on the federal government to not let Dieudonné in. Heritage Minister Mélanie Joly responded that the decision on whether he would be permitted entry was up to the CBSA. According to immigration law, Canada can ban anyone with a criminal conviction for up to five years afterward.

In the House of Commons May 10, Rempel asked if the government "use[d] its power to prevent this man from entering Canada?"

Public Safety Minister Ralph Goodale responded: "The professional officers of [the CBSA] take all relevant factors into account, including the existence of a criminal record."

FACEBOOK PHOTO

CIJA applauded the CSBA's decision. In a May 11 statement, Quebec co-chair Rabbi Reuben Poupko said: "Admissibility to Canada is not a right, but a privilege. Dieudonné forfeited this privilege with his numerous criminal convictions… The border services agents made the right call yesterday in upholding specific criteria required for entry into the country…

"In the context of a rise in violent and deadly anti-Semitism in Europe, professional anti-Semitic agitator Dieudonné is not welcome in Quebec or Canada tomorrow anymore than he was today."

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies also commented.

"We are pleased that Dieudonné was sent back home," the organization's president and CEO Avi Benlolo said in a May 10 statement. "At the same time, we are saddened that he was invited to Montreal in the first place and, despite his racism, he filled 10 shows [a total of 2,000 seats].

"Given that he has publicly denied the Holocaust and frequently makes jokes about gas chambers and invented Jewish conspiracies, what does this say about our social environment?"

Guy Chigoho, owner of Espace Mushagalusa, the venue where the shows were scheduled to take place, said he found nothing of a racist or hateful nature in the script for the show Dieudonné was to perform, called En Paix.

The local promoter of the Quebec City shows, Gino Sainte-Marie, a founder of the Festival de jazz de Québec, similarly defended the material, which he had also seen in advance. En Paix has been staged over the past year throughout France without any legal issues, he pointed out.

Dieudonné was to have taken to the stage at LaScène Lebourgneuf. He was last in Quebec City in 2008, when he was a star of the ComediHa! Fest.

His last scheduled show in Montreal in 2012 at the Corona Theatre, booked by major promoter Evenko, was cancelled after Jewish groups protested.

Espace Mushagalusa, which specializes in African art, was vandalized twice in the month leading up to Dieudonné's planned run.

In the most recent incident, over the night of May 6-7, the front window of the Ontario Street East establishment was spray-painted with "F--- Yo Couch N-----."

Three individuals were captured by the gallery's surveillance camera and the owner disseminated the video of social media. Police are investigating. ■

Fort McMurray resident shares harrowing story

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

For Howard Rensler, May 3 started like any other day, with him waking at 6 a.m. in the Fort McMurray, Alta. condo he shares with his wife Diana and heading to work at the local Boys and Girls Club, where he is executive director.

But the day didn't end until 8 a.m. on May 4, when he and Diana completed what he called a "harrowing" 12-hour drive to Edmonton along a flame-licked, four-lane highway clogged with thousands fleeing the city.

As they drove, with the fire raging about 50 kilometres away and the air full of what Rensler described as "burning chunks of trees four to five inches wide," he didn't know if they would make it.

"We just had to keep going and suppress whatever anxiety we were feeling... to subdue our impatience and panic," he said.

Originally from Toronto, Rensler, 65, has lived in Fort McMurray for about five years, after moving from Kelowna, B.C in 2004.

He said he's only aware of about a dozen other Jews living in Fort McMurray. While there's no local synagogue, a handful of them get together for Passover seders.

By around noon on May 3, Rensler recalled, a handful of spot fires were moving towards the city and he began calling parents and guardians to pick their children up from the club.

Several hours later, a mandatory evacuation order was issued and buses were sent to transport people to a shelter away from town.

The Renslers decided then to drive the roughly 400 km to Edmonton; the bumper-to-bumper traffic meant that for stretches of the journey they moved at two km/h.

For part of the drive, the fire was moving south along with them.

"At one point, the flames were right by the edge of the highway," Rensler recalled. "I saw a four-storey hotel go from a rooftop fire to complete ash in the time it took for us to pass it, about 30 feet from the road."

Outside Edmonton, a motel put them up for free that first night and brought in food for the many evacuees staying there. Edmonton residents came to the hotel with clothes and toiletries.

The Renslers stayed several nights before flying to Kelowna, where they're currently staying with friends.

They still don't know the extent of the damage to their rented condo, or whether it's even standing.

Howard Rensler at the Red Cross offices in Kelowna, B.C.

They've received a small advance from their insurance company, but Rensler noted they are "burning through that pretty fast."

They've been told it will be about three weeks before they can return to Fort McMurray, whereupon Rensler said he'll do what he can to reinstate the Boys and Girls Club.

"Right now our focus is to do our best to survive here," he said.

While he hasn't had direct contact with local Jewish organizations, a number of Jewish groups in Edmonton and elsewhere have mobilized to raise money for the evacuees.

As of May 13, the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, which set up a PayPal account to collect donations for the crisis, has raised close to $6,000, money it will likely donate to the Canadian Red Cross.

The Jewish Community Outreach Reconnect Edmonton (J.CORE), a federation sub-agency, has been collecting toys, food and diapers to deliver to evacuees in and around Edmonton.

When the crisis first hit, the Calgary Jewish Federation sent $25,000 to the Canadian Red Cross from an emergency relief fund it had. It subsequently launched a fundraising campaign for the evacuees, and has raised over $17,000 by May 13.

Elliott Steinberg, the federation's marketing and communications manager, said it will donate funds accordingly, after determining where the greatest needs are.

Toronto-based social service agency Ve'ahavta also launched a Fort McMurray relief fund May 4, and has raised over $25, 000. Like the Calgary federation, it will donate funds where needed. ■

Synagogues look to become more accessible

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Eddie Rice well remembers the handful of times he has been called to the bimah for an aliyah. The first was at his bar mitzvah in 1961. Another took place during his wedding aufruf and the most recent took place just a few days ago during Shabbat Itanu.

From 1992 – when post-polio syndrome forced him into a scooter – until recently, he was unable to climb the stairs to the bimah.

In recent years, synagogues across the city have been moving to accommodate people like Rice who live with disabilities. The Beth Tikvah congregation, where Rice davens, recently unveiled a ramp from the floor of the sanctuary to the bimah, enabling disabled Jews to fully participate in shul activities. Other houses of worship have taken steps to make their facilities more accessible as well.

The inauguration of the ramp at Beth Tikvah came slightly before Shabbat Itanu, which ran May 13-14. A project of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, "Itanu Toronto is [an] inclusion initiative" with a focus on "self assessment, outreach, [lectures], sermons, poetry, text study, programming, and more."

The Shaarei Shomayim synagogue underwent a major renovation about one year ago, during which accessibility was made an important part of the redesign. Visitors to the shul are met at street level with a ramp to bring those in wheelchairs and walkers into the building, while the same renovation included construction of a ramp inside the sanctuary to the bimah. In addition, the shul has introduced an "accessibility Ark" attached to the pulpit to allow people in wheelchairs to open and close the Ark, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler said.

Four years ago, the shul added a Shabbat elevator to provide easy access between the main level and the lower level.

"During renovations, all parts of our congregation recognized that....you can't just build for the able bodied, but you have to build for everyone," Rabbi Strauchler said.

Liviya Mendelsohn, the inclusion specialist at federation, runs a working group of 23 synagogues spanning all streams of Judaism.

The organization serves as a clearing house for the exchange of information, including advice about accessing government grants to upgrade older facilities, she said.

In recent years, the Jewish community has become more sensitive to the needs of the disabled. "It's a reflection of the wider changes in the community, the recognition of diversity and reaching out to those who felt excluded," Mendelsohn said.

One of the congregations that had a head start in accommodating people with disabilities is the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. "[The late] Rabbi Joseph Kelman was a leader in the world of educating for special needs. We started at this shul the Ezra Kadima School" in the 1960s, to provide special needs youngsters with a Jewish education and to prepare them for bar mitzvahs, said Pearl Grundland, the shul's executive director.

Eddie Rice on scooter

The Kadima Centre, as it is now called, provides educational, social and cultural programming to adults with special needs.

As Shabbat Itanu approached, the synagogue was working on yet another innovation, the installation of a "loop induction system" that would permit people with hearing aids to tune in directly to the feed from the microphone on the bimah.

Retrofitting an existing space to accommodate people in wheelchairs can be a difficult process, said Beth Tikvah president Hershel Guttman. At first it appeared 30 front row seats would have to be removed, but architect Martin Shoom presented a plan for a "compliance alternative" that used less space and still met building code requirements.

Guttman said making changes to accommodate the congregation makes sense. "We're an aging community and as people age, there will be more and more need for the ramp," he said.

Altogether the synagogue plans to spend $170,000 over the summer on renovations to make the building more accessible, Guttman added.

Rabbi Strauchler believes accommodating people with special needs goes beyond providing ramps and elevators.

"There is a certain accommodation of the soul as well," he explained. It is important for the able bodied "to look past the wheelchair and the physical and see the person and value them."

As for Rice, who serves on the Beth Tikvah accessibility committee, being able to manoeuvre his scooter up to the bimah gives him a feeling of freedom. "Freedom to be able to expand my participation in our society, by removal of barriers," he said. ■

Noa plays sold-out Vancouver Yom Ha'atzmaut concert

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONSENT

Despite the controversy in the months leading up to her Yom Ha'atzmaut performance at Vancouver's Chan Centre May 11, Achinoam Nini's concert attracted a full house and every one of the 1,185 seats was sold.

"After all the harrowing events leading up to this concert, I am so thrilled to be here and truly grateful to the Jewish Federation [of Greater Vancouver] for not folding and the Israeli Ambassador for supporting!" the Israeli singer, known as Noa, posted on her Facebook page soon after she touched down in the city.

Performing barefoot throughout, the left-wing singer thanked the audience, federation staff and the Vancouver Jewish community repeatedly during her show "for sticking up for me."

In February, the Jewish National Fund of Canada, an annual sponsor of Vancouver's community Yom Ha'atzmaut concerts, withdrew its support, saying it would take a one-year hiatus "due to the views of the entertainment booked for this year's celebration."

The organization's CEO Josh Cooper said that "the entertainer that has been hired does not reflect nor correspond to the mandate and values of JNF of Canada." Its decision followed an article in the Jerusalem Post that claimed Vancouver Jews were "outraged" over Nini's performance and alleged that she supports the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel. She has repeatedly denied the allegation.

Achinoam Nini performed May 11 at the Chan Centre.

After JNF Canada withdrew, the Israeli Embassy and the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto promptly stepped in as sponsors. Irit Stopper, deputy consul general in Toronto, represented the State of Israel at the event. It was also attended by Linda Kislowicz, president and CEO of Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA, Vancouver City Councillor Geoff Meggs and Burnaby-Lougheed NDP MLA Jane Shin.

Outside the Chan Centre, Michael Brosgart, president of the Jewish Defence League in B.C., stood with a small handful of supporters and a few placards declaring "Terrorists are obstacles to peace; Biblical Zionists are not."

A folding table held pictures of an Israeli couple murdered by Palestinian terrorists, and Brosgart distributed material to bystanders. The pages contained excerpts from letters expressing objections to Nini's performance from community member Frances Belzberg and IDF Lt.-Col. Eyal Platek, as well as links to articles about the singer.

"Noa is supporting the most divisive groups in Israel – B'Tselem, Breaking the Silence, BDS and JStreet," Brosgart said. "Unfortunately, Jewish Federation and the Israeli Embassy, because they're funding this, are supporting her. We think this is rotting the Jewish community."

On JDL's Facebook page Brosgart elaborated. "This performance will be extremely divisive, distasteful, disrespectful and does not represent the views and interests of the community. Especially at the time we need unity the most. This is not about free speech. Nini can sing her sh---y songs anywhere she wants. However, this is Israel's Independence Day. To bring an anti-Israel, terror-sympathizing, enemy-strengthening performer on this day is to spit in the face of all who have lost loved ones defending the nation of Israel."

One Israeli who attended the concert but asked not to be named said she disliked that Nini "does not separate her political views from her artistry. I'm sorry the selection committee didn't do more research before they chose her, but I think they learned a lesson," the woman said.

After seeing the Facebook responses of right-wing Israelis in Vancouver opposed to the performance, she decided to attend nevertheless. She added that once Nini was invited to Vancouver, "I think it was the best thing to keep her here instead of cancelling the performance."

A kosher restaurant, Shuk Eat & Play, hosted an alternative Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration dinner for 110 attendees the same night.

"I heard Noa's political sayings and I didn't appreciate it," said Shuk owner Alon Volodarsky. "So some people who didn't like her suggested we hold this dinner for those community members who still wanted to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut but didn't want to attend the concert." ■

Israel boycott motivated by hate: Rona Ambrose

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Interim Conservative leader Rona Ambrose denounced the "grotesque slanders" to which Israel is subject in international forums and, in particular, the boycott campaign, when she spoke at Montreal's annual downtown Israel Day Rally on May 12.

"Across Canada and around the globe, seemingly respectable people call for boycotts of Israeli goods and, even more chillingly, academics and artists," she said from the stage in Place du Canada. "Let me be clear: what is portrayed as a disagreement over policy is, in fact, driven by something far darker.

"Those who repeatedly seek to single out Israel and hold it to an impossible double standard are motivated by an age-old hatred," Ambrose continued to the cheers of a crowd of close to 3,000.

Ambrose, who leads the official Opposition, said anti-Semitism is gaining ground, whether on university campuses, in places of worship, or even the "halls of power."

"We must expose, confront and repudiate this malignancy rooted in lies and fuelled by paranoia, whenever and wherever it appears, because it is an evil so profound that it is a threat to all of us."

Ambrose saluted Israel's vibrant democracy, and her personal admiration of its upholding of women's rights in a region where those rights "continue to be denied."

The Conservative party, she said, refuses "to make excuses for groups and states that seek to wipe Israel and the Jewish People off the map," and will stand by those fighting terrorists and extremists.

In a videotaped message projected on a Jumbotron, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau said Canada's friendship with Israel "will continue to be based on our shared commitment to peace and democracy," noting that Israel is "on the frontline of democracy in the Middle East."

This celebration of the 68th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel, organized by the grassroots Jewish Unity Partnership, began at Phillips Square, where the young waved Israeli and Canadian flags and enjoyed music, led by DJ Dan Abitbol.

The weather was warm and sunny with little wind. The only detraction from the festivities was the presence, as usual, of about 20 members of the anti-Zionist chassidic group Neturei Karta, who held Palestinian flags. Police confined them to across the street in front of the Hudson's Bay department store.

A massive of show of solidarity with Israel unfolds against the backdrop of the dome of Mary Queen of the World Cathedral.
JANICE ARNOLD PHOTO

Led by Israeli Consul General in Montreal Ziv Nevo Kulman, the crowd then walked along René Lévesque Boulevard to Place du Canada under heavy police escort. At that site, Jewish gospel singer Joshua Nelson of New York on keyboard, joined by Socalled (Josh Dolgin) on drums and two backup vocalists, kept things hopping with spirited renditions of well-known Hebrew songs.

Nevo Kulman stressed that Canada is a good friend of Israel, and that support for Israel is non-partisan.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu asked in his videotaped greetings for each person to take one new action in support of Israel. "Tell a friend the truth about Israel, defend the Israel Defence Forces on Facebook, visit Israel this year," he said.

Among the other dignitaries present were Montreal Liberal MP Marc Miller; Howard Liebman, an aide to Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre; and mayors Mitchell Brownstein of Côte St. Luc and William Steinberg of Hampstead. ■

Dinner features recipes by concentration camp inmates

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A Taste to Remember, an evening of dining and remembrance hosted by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem (CSYV), literally gave guests food for thought.

The dinner was prepared from recipes written down by Jewish women during their imprisonment at various Nazi concentration camps.

About 80 people gathered May 9 at the elegant ballroom of the Windsor Arms Hotel, where they dined on chopped liver and beef goulash as they learned about the lives of Jewish inmates who shared their recipes with each other at the camps.

Talking about food helped them keep a connection to their families and cope with the brutality of life in a concentration camp, Fran Sonshine, the national chair of CSYV, explained. "This year's theme was about maintaining the human spirit during the Holocaust.

"These women rose above the filth and disease, and the constant hunger to feel closer to their families. [They] maintained a sense of normalcy by sharing their recipes... It was a way for them to maintain their humanity in inhumane conditions."

Most of the recipes were written down in notebooks cobbled together from scraps, and some of these books have been preserved as original Holocaust artifacts in the archives of Yad Vashem, the World Holocaust Remembrance Center, in Jerusalem.

Sonshine and her husband, Ed Sonshine, the event co-chairs, presented short bios of the seven women whose recipes inspired the various dishes served that evening.

The actual meal was a tasting menu, with many different dishes served in small portions.

The dinner was sponsored by Windsor Arms owner George Friedmann, who is the son of Holocaust survivors.

While his parents talked about the horrors of the war, he said, they also shared their memories of relatives who did not survive. "I have always felt a connection, almost as if I had met them."

He joked that the hotel's executive chef had never learned to make many of the dishes served at A Taste to Remember, so his mother, Alzbeta Friedmann, was on hand to supervise the preparation of such dishes as cabbage rolls and cholent with kishke.

The highlight of the evening was the personal story told by keynote speaker Nurit Stern (born Frantiska Quastler), a retired teacher for the blind who lives in Israel.

Stern was born in Slovakia and was only 12 in 1944 when she and her parents were rounded up by the Germans. She and her mother ended up together at Ravensbrück.

Nurit Stern's recipe diary from Ravensbruck

The women in the camp often talked about food and recipes in the barracks, Stern recalled. "Hungry people can only dream about food.

"I was a child. I didn't know anything about cooking. I memorized the recipes and wrote them down."

Stern said she was able to fashion a diary out of wire, cardboard, a torn stocking and some stolen paper. This diary included the women's recipes, which she jotted down from memory.

She said she risked keeping the diary, which she hid under her clothing, because if it would have been discovered, she would have been punished for stealing the paper.

Stern ended up in Sweden, where the authorities let her keep her diary after it was disinfected. Today it is part of the archives at Yad Vashem.

In fact, Dorit Novak, the director general of Yad Vashem, Jerusalem, brought Stern's diary to Toronto.

In her address, Novak said much of the intimate experience of Jewish family life has revolved around the dinner table.

"These women [who shared recipes in the camps] used their memories and imagination to memorize this most basic experience... Many chose this way to protect their sanity." ■

GUEST VOICE

Where's the kosher organic beef?

Hilary Edwards

The concept of kashrut refers to the manner in which an animal is slaughtered. Yet, how can we consider food kosher when it comes from animals who are treated as commodities with minimal concern for their welfare?

The basic laws of kashrut were derived from Leviticus and Deuteronomy. However, when the Torah was written, there were no factory farms or confined industrial factories. Animals were not injected with growth hormones and antibiotics or fed soybean, corn and grains. Meat and poultry were, by default, organic. It was unnecessary to worry about the composition of the animal. But now we do.

The existence of Jewish dietary laws suggests that God cares about the food we eat and what we put into our bodies. Surely this includes ethical concerns. Isn't it time dietary laws were overhauled to encompass ethical slaughtering, ethical eating, and the ethical care and conduct of animals while alive? And, after slaughtering, the ethical serving and presentation of food on a dinner plate?

You are not only what you eat, you are what your food eats, too. That is why grass-fed meat is better for you. The diet of cows and chickens we eat has a direct bearing on the nutritional quality and healthfulness of the food from the animal itself. And this is of ultimate concern to all of us.

I believe that ethical eating is directly tied to Judaism. The word "kashrut" is derived from the Hebrew root Kaf-Shin-Resh, meaning fit, proper, or correct. It defies purpose that kosher means "fit" to eat, and yet Jewish law is not particularly concerned with food being healthy and free of carcinogens. According to Jewish law, glatt kosher is defined as meat that has passed a test that checks the slaughtered animal is not defective. What sort of criteria are we testing for? Surely nothing could be as "fit" to eat as a meal of pastured beef or chicken from a grass-fed animal, which roamed free and lived a healthy lifestyle, free from hormonal growth promoters and antibiotic-laced food, genetically modified organisms or food based on grains laced with pesticides?

Yes, it is more expensive to eat grass-fed kosher meat, but, given its health and environmental benefits, I believe it is worth the price. Still, there is a major problem when it comes to accessibility and affordability.

> How can we consider food kosher when it comes from animals who are treated as commodities with minimal concern for their welfare?

It took six calls to various butchers across Toronto to locate a kosher organic chicken. And while a regular kosher chicken retails at around $7.30 a kilogram, a kosher organic chicken retails at approximately $20.70 a kilogram. Meanwhile, a non-kosher organic chicken sells at approximately $9.50 a kilogram.

So, what is a kosher, ethically-minded individual to do? What are the options for health-conscious Jews, without ready access to organic kosher meat and poultry, or without the desire to mortgage their home to regularly purchase kosher organic products? How do we balance the modern and the traditional; to eat according to both our beliefs and our values?

I don't have any ready answers. Perhaps kashrut organizations could upgrade their definitions of kosher to acknowledge that some animals are treated respectfully and ethically while others are not. Or, at the very least, there should be wider availability of organic meat and poultry, and more competition in price. Until then, eating smaller amounts of good-quality animal products might be the best compromise. ■

Hilary Edwards is an aspiring writer whose experience and research leading up to the writing of this article has affected her meat and poultry eating habits.

'It's not about restaurants anymore. It's about people'

"In my 12 years working in Toronto's kosher industry, I've found our kosher clients to be very open, and very loyal," he says. "We're seeing younger chefs being more creative and influenced by the kosher foodie scene in New York and Israel, which is obviously much bigger. I believe in the next few years we will continue to see big changes in Toronto's kosher food industry."

Marom also argues that having certain restrictions forces kosher chefs and foodies to be more creative.

"Limitation is the force of creativity," he says. "Because we are so limited, every time someone makes something new, we all get excited. There's nothing to be afraid of in the kosher industry, so kosher Jews always want to try new things. When a new kosher restaurant opens up in Toronto, everyone will go there."

Norene Gilletz, chef, food blogger and CJN contributor, notes that although Toronto has a burgeoning kosher food culture, it pales in comparison to cities like New York or Tel Aviv.

"Even with kosher food being so much more available today, with fresh produce coming in from all over the world, it's still so much harder here in Toronto than in the U.S.," she says. "There they have kosher restaurants for everything, and millions of choices. It's very different."

In Montreal, home to a Jewish community of about 90,000, the restaurant scene has more or less stayed the same for many years, says Michel Ben-Haim, manager of Chops Kosher Restaurant.

"A lot of restaurants have come and gone, and it's always the same places that have stayed open. The clientele is very limited. It's not like in New York, where anybody eats kosher. In Montreal, it's only members of the community or business meetings."

The Montreal community is fairly conservative when it comes to food, he continues. "People here like simple food, but prepared with great ingredients. Everything needs to be fresh, clean-cut, and prepared properly."

Daniel Davidzon, manager of marketing and communications for the Aroma Espresso Bar chain, says the demand for kosher food in Toronto has never been higher.

"We live in a time when people are more concerned than ever with what they eat, where it comes from, and how it's made. Many are looking for accessible, affordable, and healthy options when eating out, and are looking to do so in modern restaurants serving modern cuisine. The food culture in Toronto is especially strong. Diners are exposed to ingredients and cooking styles from around the world and are savvy enough to realize they can be easily duplicated with special regard to dietary lifestyles such as keeping kosher."

The kosher restaurant scene in the city is also getting more attention. In fact, May marks the second Kosher Restaurant Month in Toronto, an initiative of the Kashruth Council of Canada. The first one was held in 2013. More than 20 kosher restaurants are participating this year by offering patrons a 10 per cent discount. According to Richard Rabkin, the council's managing director, Toronto is the only city in North America that has such a month-long event.

"Kosher restaurants are an important part of making a Jewish community viable, so we want to do our part to encourage people to visit their local kosher restaurants," Rabkin says. "The more people who visit, the more viable they will be."

"The kosher food market is definitely on the rise here," adds David Blum, corporate executive chef at Toronto's Savours Fresh Market kosher grocery. "Kosher consumers are more educated now, allowing companies to introduce new lines of different foods. Being a kosher foodie today is very exciting, because everything is new. No one was talking about beef bacon and kosher salami a few years ago. We're taking items from the non-kosher market and twisting it around to meet our dietary needs."

The rise in popularity of Food Network shows like Chopped and Master Chef has also helped, he says, because they influence and inspire Jewish chefs to do something similar.

"Being a foodie means you love to explore. When it comes to being kosher, it's equally doable, you just have a smaller market to work with," Blum says. "Just look at sushi. Twenty years ago, the only kosher restaurants were delis. Today, kosher sushi has become a staple in most Jewish communities."

So it appears my friend really was wrong: you can keep kosher and call yourself a foodie. ■

Wynne's visit to Israel focuses on high-tech initiatives

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, TEL AVIV

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne spoke with members of her delegation at the official welcome reception for her mission to the Middle East.

While snow fell over Toronto on May 15 and temperatures sank to 1C, over 150 Ontarians basked in the warm rays of Mediterranean sunshine as the sun set over Tel Aviv at a reception to kick off Premier Kathleen Wynne's business mission to Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

The weeklong mission, is part of Wynne's agenda to create jobs and opportunities for Ontarians and to boost Ontario's presence on the global stage, and will include a focus on high-tech, environment, life sciences and biomedical initiatives. While many similar missions aim to match Israeli intellectual capital with Canadian financing, Wynne emphasized the collaborative nature of the partnerships to be announced over the mission.

"I think Ontario has intellectual capital," Wynne said at the reception. "We're in a very interesting relationship in terms of our ability to innovate, our ability to feed into and partner with the innovation and intellectual energy that is here in Israel."

Ontario Health Minister Eric Hoskins, who has joined in two previous trade missions to Israel, called the group "the largest delegation I've ever been a part of... not just in numbers, but in terms of quality." The group included a number of MPPs, corporations such as BlackBerry, universities like McMaster and York along with a number of private businesses.

"This is Ontario's opportunity to strengthen a relationship which is already strong," Hoskins told The CJN. "We have the opportunity to partner with Israeli innovation... incredible academic institutions, teaching facilities, hospitals, including the Weizmann centre and the Technion; there are so many examples where amazing things are happening."

Wynne's office credits the booming medical and high-tech fields in Israel in part to the fact that the country invests four per cent of its GDP per year into research and development.

On the first day of the mission alone, delegates signed 18 new business agreements and partnerships in the science and technology and information and communications technology (ICT) sectors, including a $50 million five-year deal between Ontario's Centre for Commercialization of Regenerative Medicine and six Israeli universities and research institutions. Wynne's office estimates that this project will generate an estimated 150 new jobs in Ontario.

> This is Ontario's opportunity to strengthen a relationship which is already strong.
> Health Minister Eric Hoskins

Other agreements signed on Monday include a $3 million deal between Toronto's University Health Network and Israel-based Insightec, and another worth $4 million between the Canadian Centre for Aging and Brain Health Innovation at Baycrest Health Sciences and the Office of the Chief Scientist in Israel.

Though the trip is strictly business for Wynne, who has led previous delegations to China, the United States, and most recently, India, in January, she said this trip had a personal aspect as well. Wynne, who will be celebrating her 63rd birthday in Israel, said "I'm almost embarrassed to say that this is the first time I've been here.

"Having grown up in a Judeo-Christian environment, it's impossible not to be curious about what I'm going to learn about my own history and my own roots."

Wynne's visit will include a trip to the Kotel. Besides spending time in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, the group will visit Ramallah and Bethlehem over the course of the week.

Delegate Peter Mascher of Hamilton's McMaster University is excited to be partnering with four universities in the West Bank along with universities in Israel, increasing opportunities for McMaster students around the world. This was his third trip to Israel in a year, hammering out a new agreement with Tel Aviv University to promote collaboration in areas like nanotechnology and biomedical engineering, which he sees as a perfect fit between the two schools.

"The intersection of health sciences and engineering provides the greatest opportunities for joint research projects... This is a very exciting initiative," said Mascher.

Wynne herself visited Tel Aviv University where she was honoured with the President's Award.

Wynne also met former Israeli president Shimon Peres and Dr. Michael Hayden, president of Global Research and Development (R&D) and chief scientific officer at Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd., to discuss future business opportunities and promote Ontario's life sciences sector.

Veteran MPP Monte Kwinter, who has joined numerous missions to Israel in his long tenure, said this trip was an acknowledgment of many shared cultural values. "There's no limit to what Ontario and Israel can do together," he said.

However, critics claimed before the trip that Wynne's business mission was less about jobs for Ontarians than about pandering to Ontario's 200,000 Jewish voters, most centred in Toronto, which is also home to over 60 per cent of Canada's Israelis.

The last Ontario premier to visit Israel was Dalton McGuinty in 2010. Other leaders making the trip in recent years have included former Nova Scotia premier Darrell Dexter in 2011 and then prime minister Stephen Harper in 2014. ■

IDF values under attack, defence minister says

JUDAH ARI GROSS AND MARISSA NEWMAN
JERUSALEM

Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon urged Israel Defence Forces (IDF) leaders to keep speaking out against the "extremist minority" who, he said, were working to undermine the values of Israel's military.

In his address last Sunday, Ya'alon appeared to back Deputy Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Yair Golan, who seemed to liken "certain trends" in Israel to pre-Nazi Germany in an address on Yom Hashoah three weeks ago. Golan's speech was fiercely criticized by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who also reportedly scolded Ya'alon in a "tense" phone call.

In sharp contrast to Netanyahu, Ya'alon has dismissed the widespread criticism of Golan, saying he had "full confidence" in the "valued and accomplished" deputy chief of staff. Golan clarified that he never intended to compare Israel to prewar Germany, and Netanyahu later insisted the issue was "behind us."

Ya'alon doubled down on his support for the army amid an ongoing public row over the manslaughter indictment of Sgt. Elor Azaria, who killed a disarmed Palestinian stabber in Hebron in March.

"In recent months, we found ourselves fighting against an extremist minority, working in the field and on social media. Some have infiltrated mainstream [Israeli] society, clandestinely and in disguise, and are trying to influence the image and values of the IDF," Ya'alon said, in an address to the IDF leadership at the defence ministry's headquarters in Tel Aviv.

The fight against this group "keeps me up at night," Ya'alon said, adding that it "makes me determined to fight this."

The issue is not one of "right or left," he continued. The army will not allow "trigger-happy [soldiers], revenge, or the loss of self-control," he said.

At the same time, he contended that "we will support those who made mistakes in good faith, but we will not tolerate those who reject authority and act against the law and [our] values."

Turning to the IDF's top generals, he instructed them: "Do not fear, do not hesitate, do not be deterred. Be courageous not only on the battlefield, but also in the briefing room. A good army is an army whose officers, junior and senior alike, feel safe in their ability to speak their minds at all times with the knowledge that they won't be hurt," he continued.

Moshe Ya'alon

"This is my demand of you, senior IDF officers, and this ought to be your demand of your subordinates: Keep acting in accordance with your humane conscience and moral compass, and not according to which way the winds are blowing," he added.

A statement from the Prime Minister's Office on Sunday said Netanyahu gives "full backing" to the IDF, but reiterated that Golan's comments were "inappropriate.

"IDF officers express their opinions freely, in the relevant forums and on the issues that are under their jurisdiction," the statement from Netanyahu's office said. "The IDF is the people's army and must remain out of political debates."

The prime minister "firmly believes that the comparison to Nazi Germany was an inappropriate statement, made at an inappropriate time, and caused Israel damage in the international arena," it added.

The debate over the army's values has dominated the public debate following Azaria's indictment and Golan's criticism of Israeli society.

On Israel's Memorial Day, Ya'alon said soldiers must show restraint, uphold their values, and not "lose their heads" even in the heat of fighting. "Even in the difficult moments, when your blood boils and the rage is great, woe to us if we lose our way and our values," Ya'alon said at the Kiryat Shaul military cemetery in Tel Aviv. Ya'alon cautioned that excessive force was liable to lead Israel to "the abyss." ■

On the Omer, sports and racism

Yair Lootsteen

This is a special time of year here in Israel. Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut are behind us and before we turn around Lag b'Omer and Yom Yerushalayim will be here. A complicated mix of sadness, contemplation, jubilation and good fun.

Summer begins as we complete this season. This year those who enjoy sports have much to look forward to.

The Rio Olympics begin Aug. 5. We're hoping to see Israeli athletes on the podium at this Olympiad and perhaps even hear Hatikvah.

Look for our competitors in windsurfing, sailing, gymnastics, wrestling, athletics, judo and more. Talented young people sacrificing much, for years, while training tirelessly. They bring hope and genuine pride to all Israelis.

Judo's my favourite. Maybe it's because Natan, my 16-year-old, has been at it since he was four. Or perhaps it's because Israel has become a judo powerhouse.

About a month ago Natan came running excitedly into my room, asking if I knew Timna Nelson Levy. Of course, I said. Timna and my daughter had been together in primary school and her parents are members of our synagogue. Turns out she had just won a bronze medal at the European Judo Championships. When I called her dad to congratulate him, I learned Timna has an outside chance of making it to Rio, although she's really setting her sights on 2020's Tokyo Olympics.

Earlier in the summer, beginning June 10, Europe's top 16 national soccer teams will compete for UEFA's Euro 2016 championship. Held every four years, this year's month-long tournament will take place in France.

Israel's national team didn't make it through to the final 16. It never has. Our soccer is simply not good enough.

Soccer is a tribal sport. You choose a team as a kid and stay with it for life. Rivalries abound. That's true in Israel too. Fans of Maccabi and Hapoel Tel Aviv should not be left alone in the same room.

But in Israel, the Middle East conflict also enters the playing field.

Jerusalem's premier team, Beitar Yerushalayim, has never had an Arab player. Games between Beitar and other "Jewish" teams and Bnei Sakhnin, the country's most successful Arab club, require the presence of hundreds of policemen. Because of violence, the Israel Football Association recently decided only home team fans could attend games between Beitar and Bnei Sakhnin. At the latest game between the two in Jerusalem that wasn't enough. Beitar fans hurled racist obscenities and real objects at Sakhnin's players and at referees when Sakhnin won 3-0.

Speaking at a Holocaust memorial event on the eve of Yom Hashoah, the IDF's Deputy Chief of Staff, Maj.-Gen. Yair Golan, caused a brouhaha when he stated that " if there is something that frightens me about the memory of the Holocaust, it is seeing the abhorrent processes that took place in Europe, and Germany in particular, some 70, 80 or 90 years ago, and finding manifestations of these processes here among us in 2016.

"Indeed," he continued, "there is nothing easier than to simply hate the other, there is nothing easier than to provoke fears and strike terror; there is nothing easier than barbaric behaviour, moral corruption and hypocrisy."

Golan was rebuked for his words. Calls were heard for his resignation.

Even if he chose an inappropriate venue for his words and should have avoided any implicit link between yesteryear Germany and modern-day Israel – such a link is unacceptable - Golan expressed legitimate moral concerns about where Israeli society is going, when fear and hatred abound and yes - racism too.

Having lived in Jerusalem for 37 years, I've never attended a Beitar game and have no intention of doing so.

I am looking forward to a great summer of sports. I'm hoping to see Israeli athletes with medals round their necks.

Good luck to Timna and her colleagues. Do us proud. ■

IF I'M SEPARATED, WHAT IF I DIE?

So imagine you are going through a separation but you're not yet divorced. Like most people your current Will likely leaves most everything to the spouse you once loved and have now grown to hate. If there is no Will the same thing could happen. And guess what? Before divorce, if you don't do something about it and a bus hits you crossing Bathurst Street ,well, you may have missed your chance to leave it all to someone else, like your kids, your siblings, Baycrest or your favorite pet.

It is a popular misconception that a legal separation will have any effect on the appointment of an estate trustee or the distribution of an estate under a will. When spouses are divorced, section 17(2) of the Succession Law Reform Act ("SLRA") states that any provision of a will which appoints the former spouse as executor or estate trustee and any provision which provides the former spouse with a beneficial interest are revoked. However, there is no similar provision with regards to spouses who are separated but not yet divorced or subject to a finalized separation agreement, which means that separated spouses maintain their entitlements under the will unless it has been changed. The same holds true if there is no will – in the case of an intestacy – as the former spouse could stand to inherit the entire value of the estate in accordance with the provisions under Part II of the SLRA.

So what should be done upon separation? With regards to wills, it is important that any existing wills which appoint your former spouse as executor or provides him or her with a beneficial interest be revised or that new wills are created. Often spouses will have created reciprocal or mutual wills, which are wills that are essentially mirror images of each other where the spouses agree to dispose of their property in a certain manner and there is an implied mutual agreement that the surviving spouse will not revoke his or her will after the other spouse's death. These wills often bequest all assets to the surviving spouse upon the death of the first spouse, and then all assets are to be distributed equally among the children upon the death of the second spouse. When these types of wills exist it is important that they are properly revised upon separation, as the beneficial interest will otherwise pass to the now former surviving spouse.

While a separation is being finalized and even when going through a divorce, one option for former spouses who want to make changes to their wills quickly is to create a holograph will. Holograph wills are handwritten wills that are signed by the testator. Creating a new will, even a holograph will, automatically revokes your previous will and ensures that bequests are made directly to your children or any other designated beneficiary. This allows your assets to be properly dealt with and excludes your former spouse from the will in the interim until there is time to have your lawyer create a more detailed formal will. A lawyer should be consulted to ensure that the proper steps are taken before creating a holograph will.

Another important issue to consider during a separation is severing any joint tenancy that exists between you and your former spouse with regards to joint ownership of any real estate, most likely the matrimonial home. Property that is held as a joint tenancy most times will pass entirely to the surviving owner by right of survivorship, unless there is evidence to the contrary, as opposed to a tenancy in common which allows ownership to be held as an undivided interest which can then be left to beneficiaries under a will. In the case of Hansen Estate v. Hansen, the court confirmed that there are three ways of severing a joint tenancy; by a person acting on his/her own share (i.e. transferring their interest to themselves as tenant in common), by mutual agreement, or by a course of dealing which indicated that the parties intended the property to be held as tenants in common. The definition of "course of dealing" was further clarified by the Ontario Court of Appeal, which determined that it is an inherently fact-specific assessment. For this reason it is important to seek legal advice in order to ensure that any existing joint tenancy is properly considered.

Upon separation it is also important to review your continuing power of attorney for property and power of attorney for personal care. If a former spouse was appointed as power of attorney, steps must be taken to revoke the current powers of attorney or execute new ones. Section 12(2) of the Substitute Decisions Act, 1992 requires that a revocation be in writing and witnessed by two people. Finally, you should take the necessary steps to consider the beneficiaries listed on any life insurance policies, benefit plans, pensions, RRSPs and TFSAs, if necessary.

Whatever your individual circumstances, it is important to discuss these issues with a both a family law lawyer and an estate lawyer if you are anticipating separating or after it to ensure that your estate planning is done in contemplation of your individual circumstances and in accordance with your wishes.

Peace summit will occur French minister insists

JTA
JERUSALEM

The foreign minister of France said that the international Middle East peace summit will take place despite objections by Israel.

"Action must be taken," Jean-Marc Ayrault said May 15 at Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport at the close of a one-day visit to Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA). "[Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu said he only wanted direct negotiations, but that option is stalled.

"It's clear to us – and I said this to Netanyahu and Abbas – that we cannot fulfil the role of the two sides," he said, referring to PA President Mahmoud Abbas. "They will need to carry out direct negotiations but because the process is stuck, they need external help. The goal is to encourage them to return to the negotiating table.

"I know that there is strong opposition," he said, appearing to be referring to Netanyahu. "This is not new and it won't discourage us. The conference will take place."

Ayrault said U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry spoke positively of the idea of the conference and that France would be willing to postpone the meeting, scheduled for May 30, which is Memorial Day in the United States, so that Kerry could attend. Kerry reportedly has spoken in recent days with Abbas and Netanyahu about the proposed summit.

Netanyahu said at the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday that he made it clear to Ayrault during their meeting that he opposed the summit and attempts by France to broker a peace process.

Netanyahu said he told Ayrault that "the scandalous UNESCO decision, which was supported by France, that does not recognize the Jewish People's ties – which are thousands of years old – to the Temple Mount, casts a shadow on the fairness of any forum that France tries to convene. He told me that this decision stemmed from a misunderstanding and that he would personally see to it that it does not recur. I told him that the only way to advance a true peace between us and the Palestinians is by means of direct negotiations between us and them, without preconditions.

"Our experience with history shows that only this way did we achieve peace with Egypt and Jordan and that any other attempt only makes peace more remote and gives the Palestinians an escape hatch to avoid confronting the root of the conflict, which is non-recognition of the State of Israel." ■

Shul's fundraiser to pay tribute to Jewish composers

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A growing congregation north of Toronto is holding its first-ever fundraising musical production that will feature pieces from the Renaissance to Yiddish folk tunes to George Gershwin classics.

On May 28, Am Shalom Congregation, a Reform synagogue in south Barrie, is presenting Simcha, a show that pays homage to Jewish composers from the 17th century to the present day.

"We thought it would be nice to celebrate Jewish composers over the centuries and have a broad spectrum of music that is Jewish-oriented, with relation to the composers or the music itself," said Shirat Am Shalom choir director and pianist Marilyn Reesor, who has been leading the 15-member choir since it formed in 2013.

In addition to pieces by the famous Italian Renaissance composer Salomone Rossi, 19th-century German siblings Felix and Fanny Mendelssohn, German Jewish liturgical composer Louis Lewandowski, German-born French composer Jacques Offenbach and Russian-born American pianist Mischa Levitski, the event will also feature musical guests such as Anna Trubashnik, cantor emerita at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, and cellist Alyssa Wright.

Howard Bloom moved in 1998 from Toronto to Simcoe County, where he and his wife bought a farm north of Barrie and raised two children. He said the congregation – founded in the 1970s and formerly known as the Simcoe County Jewish Association, before its building was erected around 2003 – is growing.

"There are about 80 to 90 member families... I noticed the other day that we have 30 children in the Jewish school, and that is a prime example of a growing community when you see small children in the system," Bloom said.

As important as it is for Am Shalom to serve the Simcoe County Jewish community, Bloom and Reesor see the fundraiser as an opportunity to reach out to the broader community as well.

"I think it's important that we share the Jewish music, the Jewish composers with the Barrie and Simcoe County community... We invite the cottagers that are up on a Saturday night to come out and to be part of a beautiful evening that will close with a Havdalah, and to share the music that is happening in the congregation," Bloom said.

"There are a lot of people in Barrie who have not been to this synagogue and are interested in coming in and having a little bit more of a connection with the Jewish community. We're reaching out to all of Barrie, and you can almost consider this an open house. We've had a lot of response from people outside the community who are very excited to come in and experience a bit of the Jewish culture and Jewish music," said Reesor, who isn't Jewish but connected with the shul through "musical friends" who are Am Shalom members.

She explained that Gerald and Liz Levine reached out to her when they decided to establish a fund in memory of Gerald's parents to facilitate a formal music program at the shul.

The funds raised from the May 28 event, which she hopes will attract about 200 Jews and non-Jews from the local community and beyond, will go toward enhancing the music program and purchasing new instruments.

Bloom praised Reesor for her talent and dedication to bringing the best out of the three-year-old choir.

"Marilyn is very accomplished. Being a choir leader and a musical director who isn't Jewish makes it even more special, because she is very talented musically. She brings a musical direction that is unbiased, that really speaks to music and quality and something that fits us as a choir, and she's taken us from a lay choir to an emerging talented group of people." ■

Matti Friedman's new book explores events that presage wars of 21st century

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

For author Matti Friedman, the most noteworthy takeaway after interviewing several dozen soldiers stationed during the 1990s at a remote military outpost in Lebanon, was their surprise simply at being asked.

Israel's presence at "the Pumpkin," the hilltop base in southern Lebanon that the Israeli military held from 1994 to 2000, exists in individual, but not collective, memory, Friedman said.

He added: "These experiences haven't been considered important [by the Israeli public]. There's no monument there...Most of the guys I spoke to had internalized the idea that nothing important had happened there...telling me I was the first to ask them about it since they'd left Pumpkin."

The Toronto-born writer, who himself served two tours at Outpost Pumpkin as a platoon sergeant, has written a new book, Pumpkinflowers: A Soldier's Story, published May 3 by Algonquin Books.

Part memoir and part journalism, it's about Friedman and other soldiers' experiences at the base, as well as the implications of what happened there.

On May 19, Friedman will be in Toronto for a book launch held at the Leo and Sala Goldhar Conference and Celebration Centre.

Presented by UJA Federation of Toronto and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, the event will feature a discussion about writing, Jewish identity and Israel's present and future with Friedman and fellow Canadian Jewish author David Bezmozgis, as well as Rafi Yablonsky, manager of Strategic Initiatives & UJA Young Leaders at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Pumpkinflowers highlights a particularly traumatic incident that occurred in 1994, several years before Friedman got to Outpost Pumpkin: Hezbollah fighters attacked the outpost with shells and rocket fire, killing one Israeli soldier and wounding two. Four guerrillas scrambled up the hill followed by a cameraman, who documented their planting a Hezbollah flag in the ground.

Set to martial music, the video was then broadcast to millions of viewers across the Islamic world.

Friedman, who arrived at the outpost four years later, said the event became among those who served there like a "story you tell kids at bedtime to scare them."

Because it was believed that the soldiers who'd been attacked and humiliated by Hezbollah hadn't been sufficiently alert, Friedman said that recounting to his soldiers what had happened was "a way to get them to stay awake in the guard post."

Friedman described guarding an outpost as "a dreary routine."

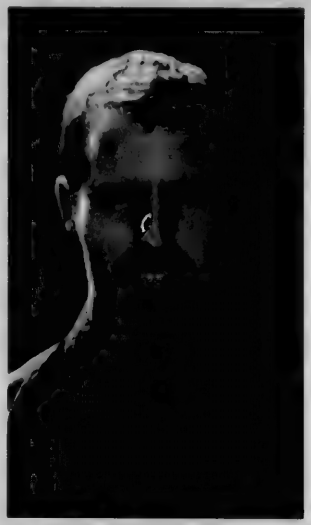
"Usually nothing happens," he added, "so it's deadening and exhausting. After a few weeks or months your guard can slip."

In addition to wanting to tell a universal story of war, of young people fresh out of high school thrown into "a pretty extreme and interesting place," Friedman said, he wished to capture a period that saw a type of warfare that he believes "presaged much of what has happened since Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000 and since the attacks of 9/11."

In that sense, the book is "a kind of prologue to the wars of the 21st century," he explained.

Those years in Lebanon are significant, he said, because Israel's experience fighting an enemy that was markedly weaker yet used improvised explosive devices (IEDs), videotaped hit and run attacks, and were essentially, "not afraid to die" foretold the type of wars the West would be fighting in the Middle East in this century.

"After 9/11 Western armies have found themselves in the Middle East fighting wars that look a lot like this war in Lebanon did, fighting these Islamic guerrillas who are using hit and run tactics, who are savvy in the use of media and acting according to religious ideology that makes very little sense to people in the West," Friedman said.



Matti Friedman

Born in 1977 in Toronto, Friedman attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute for high school and moved to Israel at age 17.

Although he'd initially planned to work on a kibbutz for a year, he fell in love with the country and has lived there ever since.

He currently resides in Jerusalem with his family.

Friedman's first book, The Aleppo Codex, was published in 2012 and won the Sami Rohr Prize and the Canadian Jewish Book Award.

His journalistic writing has appeared in publications including The Atlantic, The New York Times and Tablet Magazine. ■

Remembering a 'renaissance' rabbi

Evelyn Tauben

Rabbi Ronald Aigen

With profound humility and sadness, I write this month's column. Last week, the Jewish world, and Canadian Jewry in particular, quite suddenly and entirely prematurely, lost a shining neshamah who was, among a great many other things, a tremendous advocate for Jewish arts and culture.

In fact, Rabbi Aigen (it was my own conservatism that never allowed me to called him Rabbi Ron as everyone else did) gave me my first real job in the sphere of Jewish arts, in an arena where such jobs are not plentiful. He had a long-held dream of establishing a contemporary art gallery embedded within his Reconstructionist community, Congregation Dorshei Emet in Montreal. I signed on as the first curator and together we created the Emet Gallery.

The gallery's name not only stood for emet (truth) as in the congregation's moniker but it's also a Hebrew acronym for emunah (spirituality), musar (ethics) and tarbut (culture) – tenets inherent in Rabbi Aigen's conception of a multi-faceted, dynamic and flourishing Jewish future. He was equally invested in developing meditation and mindfulness practices within the shul community and fostering social justice as in establishing a space for contemporary art filtered through a Jewish lens. In the Emet Gallery, we exhibited video art and photography by established Canadian and Israeli artists.

In advancing his ideas, Rabbi Aigen had a gentle touch but a fiery heart. He was responsive to his congregation, highly creative and thoughtful in their own right, but also dared to be an agitator and to insist on risk-taking even when others did not fully appreciate the gallery concept. As with many forward-thinking cultural experiments, the Emet Gallery did not last long. But when it was running, it was an energetic addition to the Jewish cultural landscape of Montreal, sparking dialogue and collaborations. It is a reminder at this deeply sad time that longevity is not the only marker of a lasting impression.

As we laid the groundwork for the gallery, Rabbi Aigen wrote in the November 2006 synagogue bulletin of arts and culture. It is only fitting to draw attention here to his own words on the topic: "The arts and culture are an important gateway into Judaism, allowing more people to enter 'our' world. It's a significant new gateway not just because it's 'fun' and 'easy,' but because arts and culture engage people emotionally as well as intellectually, often creating an essential fusion of the two. However, in order to really attract people, especially the younger generation, we must get beyond the nostalgic kitsch that has passed for Jewish art and culture in the past. Jews today will no longer be satisfied with Jewish culture if it is not as emotionally and intellectually engaging as the culture available to them in the rest of the world. We must demand better if we want our Judaism to go beyond survival and to really thrive."

I am inspired anew, revisiting his sentiments a decade later, by his charge to us to thrive as a people through creativity. Part of his greatness as a rabbi was in forging a voice of leadership in many arenas of Jewish experience vital to a thoughtful, holistic Jewish life.

In another article, Rabbi Aigen referred to the teachings of the prophet Joel: "Your elders will dream dreams; your youth will see visions." This text resonates with Rabbi Aigen's impact on my life at a formative moment when I chose to leave the mainstream art world to help shape an "emotionally and intellectually engaging" Jewish arts scene in Canada.

Rabbi Aigen dreamed – he dreamed big and bold. Those of us "youth" who participated in his dream saw the vision realized and reverberating profoundly. If only he could have grown into the elder that the prophet speaks of, creating into the retirement he was to begin next month. Now that dream has died but the Rabbi's vision lives on. ■

Film's emotional pull mixed with humour and romance

jserge@thecjn.ca

Three Jewish women, Auschwitz survivors, reunite in 1960 for the first time at a beach resort in northern France in To Life (À La Vie), a warm, touching movie opening in Toronto and Montreal on May 20.

To Life opens in Auschwitz as the Nazis are clearing the camp and ordering the infamous Death March at the end of the war. Then we see Hélène, one of the three women, return to her home in Paris. She has lost contact with the two women she was close with in the camps, Lili and Rose. She believes that while Lili survived, Rose perished during the chaotic camp evacuation.

In Paris, Hélène marries her childhood sweetheart, also a survivor, who is impotent due to sterility tests conducted on him in the camp.

Hélène, admirably played by Julie Depardieu (Gérard's daughter) is determined to reunite with Lili and puts a classified ad in the deportees newspaper each year until finally, 15 years later, she hears from Lili and the two plan to reunite at the resort in Berck Plage.

To Life, the story of three Holocaust survivors, opens in Toronto and Montreal May 20.

In Berck Plage, Lili (Johanna ter Steege) surprises her by bringing Rose, who did in fact survive the war, and is now living in Montreal.

Hélène is thrilled, yet understandably upset at the surprise. "What if I had a weak heart?" she admonishes Lili. "Why didn't you tell me?"

If the three women weren't in their mid-30s now, one could easily describe what follows as a "coming-of-age" movie. Hélène, who admits to still being a virgin despite being married, is courted by a couple of men, including the young Pierre, who oversees the Mickey Mouse Club, a play area for children.

But behind the playfulness of the resort setting, replete with vintage late-'50s automobiles and roller-pinned coiffures, lurks, as one would expect, survivors' guilt and secrets.

Rose (Suzanne Clément) refuses to even talk about Auschwitz, making the other two promise not to bring it up at all. As with many survivors, she hates waste and makes them all use one teabag for the duration of their vacation.

And so, as far away from the Holocaust as possible, amongst the flirtations, the sunny weather, the Twist, bikinis and floral dresses, the three friends come to grips with their past and the secrets they buried there. Questions are slowly answered. Why didn't Lili tell Hélène that Rose survived? Why does Rose refuse to talk about Auschwitz?

Directed by Jean-Jacques Zilbermann and inspired by his mother's life story (he previously filmed the documentary Irene and Her Sisters about her), the feature is very moving and, at the same time, sprinkled with humour and romance. The setting, a French beach resort in the early '60s, also adds a sense of joie-de-vivre to this otherwise emotional story. It meanders at times, especially with the storyline of Hélène's communist suitor, but otherwise there's much to enjoy in To Life. ■

Singer-songwriter pays tribute to his deceased father

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

On a spiritual journey that took him to Israel after his father's death, singer-songwriter Evan Malach wrote some of the songs on his new double English and Hebrew rock CD, recorded with a Grammy-winning producer.

While learning at Jerusalem's Yeshivat Darche Noam (also known as Shapell's) in 2012, Malach wrote Ben, a song that eulogizes his father, Howard.

"I think about him all the time," Malach said about the man who took him to his first rock concert, to see the Steve Miller Band.

Malach will be performing songs from this album at Jewish Music Week which starts May 29.

At the yeshiva, Malach gleaned some insights into songwriting from his study of the Talmud. "When you are learning a piece of Talmud, so much information is packed into so few words. I think that's what make strong songwriting as well, evoking a lot from a little," he said.

That summer, Malach, whose voice and singing style resembles Bruce Springsteen's, won the international Hallelujah Global Jewish Singing Contest for his rendition of Blues Kna'ani, which set him on the path to singing in Hebrew.

Malach, 31, studied Hebrew while attending Leo Baeck Day School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Mark Levinson and his son, Shakhai worked with Malach on translating the Hebrew songs on the CD, When All Is One.

> I think about him all the time.

Ben, Malach's meditative tribute to his father, has a Hebrew version, as do Save the World (Geulah), a rocker about redemption; The One (Ha'Echad), a spiritual rocker about overcoming doubt; Graceful Rose (Shoshana), a love song Malach wrote while sitting on the rooftop of the yeshiva, and The Reason (Ha'Ya'ad), about recognizing the mistakes of past relationships and trying to learn from them. With help from Cantor Benjamin Maissner, the music director of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, Malach perfected the Hebrew vocals for the CD.

Comparing Malach's new 17-track release to his 2012 CD, Along the Endless Highway, Malach's guitarist, Rich Grossman, in a video about the making of When All Is One, said, "There's definitely more of a spiritual vibe in these songs. It's more of a grounded project this time round... As opposed to taking different parts of his life and putting it together to make one record, there's a vision."

Malach and his band recorded When All Is One last November with Grammy-winning producer Malcolm Burn, who's worked with Emmylou Harris, Daniel Lanois and Bob Dylan. Malach met Burn, who also produced his 2012 recording, serendipitously, through Arzhang Ardavan, a physics professor with some cool friends, who came to a garage sale Malach held.

In the video about the making of When All Is One, Burn said he "enjoys creating something that perhaps the artist themselves hasn't envisioned." As an example of Burn's work, Malach said the producer helped turn his folk song, The Mirror, an allegory about Adam and Eve, into an "'80s New Wave evocative song."

Malach's main influences are Dylan, Neil Young and Springsteen. Malach has studied Springsteen's videos and has performed some of those songs, including My City of Ruins, which he cited as an influence on his songwriting.

"It's so easy to access performance now," he said. "It's almost this natural, organic way of absorbing as an artist, emulating that in a way that's authentic to yourself, and creating your own style around it." ■

Malach and his band, guitarist Grossman, bassist Tyler Emond and drummer Jeremy Kleynhans, perform both Hebrew and English tracks from When All Is One on June 2 at 7 p.m. at the Lula Lounge as part of Jewish Music Week. The Shinshinim, singing Israeli pop hits, open the show. Malach's CD can be downloaded from www.evanmalach.com. You can view the video, The Making of When All Is One, on Youtube. Tony Kushner's controversial appearance at Koffler

Playwright distinguishes politics from his art

A. DAVID LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The controversy surrounding the Koffler Centre's evening with Tony Kushner May 9 seemed poised to engulf the event itself, what with the UJA's disavowal of the event over Kushner's ties to pro-boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) group Jewish Voice for Peace (Kushner himself does not support BDS), and the playwright's subsequent accusations of censorship - but the Pulitzer Prize-winner took care to distinguish his political opinions from his writing process while reflecting on both in a broad conversation with Obsidian Theatre's Philip Akin.

Without explicit mention of the controversy, Koffler executive director Cathy Jonasson pushed back in her opening remarks, re-asserting the centre's support for inquiry, exploration, and "the right to free speech that allows us to have a healthy cultural dialogue."

Akin's first question followed suit. Presenting a photo of Kushner protesting at Columbia University in 1978, Akin wondered if the idea of protest might lie "at the heart" of Kushner's work.

While embracing the notion of protest and free speech (as has been reported), Kushner drew a line between his political opinions and his artistic output, rejecting the idea of writing plays with a "thesis" in mind. "If I have a point that I'm trying to make, I'm going to write something that's ultimately not going to be very interesting."

For Kushner, the unique appeal of the theatre comes from its ephemeral, uncontrollable nature. "They [plays] have a life of their own that's at least half composed of the life the audience gives them. And every audience is different, every night is different, and you surrender to that."

In fact, said Kushner, an audience is impacted by a play in much the same way as a dreamer is affected by a dream. "Your unconscious stages things, shows you things – meaningful things – in the form of allegories and riddles and metaphors, and you can then choose to remember them or not remember them, decipher them or not decipher them when you wake up.

"The thrill is when you've got something going that is spinning around a mystery, an unresolvable set of questions, and you generate meaning in conversation with an audience."

Kushner finds himself drawn to playwrights like fellow Pulitzer Prize-winner Susan-Lori Parks, whose work has "a richness and a strangeness and a complexity and an unpredictability" where "I'm not sitting waiting for an answer. I'm sitting and waiting for the right questions to take out of the theatre and bring home and brood about."

It was a question about Donald Trump that brought the discussion back to the political - asked if he could write a play that would "take down Donald Trump", Kushner appealed to the same dichotomy of politics and art."We don't need playwrights to take down Donald Trump. We need democracy."

Reflecting on Trump's success and the potential collapse of the Republican party, Kushner couldn't help but connect the dots."The thing that's so maddening – and this is why I get so angry at things like this UJA thing – there are such serious problems that the world needs to turn its attention to.... The survival of the state of Israel – something that I care about passionately – is increasingly endangered, not because I wrote liner notes for The Klezmatics. So much time gets wasted on nonsense. And the really difficult things that we need to be attending to as a global community don't get attended to.

"The system works," he says. "We just have to vote." ■

Writer says federation is silencing discussion about Israel

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Addressing the controversy that preceded his May 9 Toronto appearance, American Jewish playwright Tony Kushner accused UJA Federation of Greater Toronto of trying to silence discussion about Israeli policy and the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

Speaking in conversation with Canadian theatre director Philip Akin, Kushner criticized the federation for disassociating itself from his talk – which was presented by one of federation's beneficiary agencies, the Koffler Centre for the Arts – because Kushner advises a group that supports the BDS movement against Israel.

Kushner told Akin: "My opinions about the situation in the Middle East are pretty middle of the road. I'm not extreme in any way, so it's hugely depressing to think that somebody with the level of criticism I voiced about the treatment of Palestinians at the hands of the Israeli Defence Forces or the Israeli government should cause this kind of alarm and consternation...To say we can't have discussions about issues like BDS...anyone who believes that that makes Israel safer is a fool. Silence is the surest way to weaken policy."

Kushner, whose body of work includes the Pulitzer Prize-winning play Angels in America: A Gay Fantasia on National Themes and the screenplays for Steven Spielberg's 2005 film Munich and 2012 film Lincoln, also said he believes the federation "has no business dictating how the recipients of its philanthropy spend their money as long as they're staying true to their mission... that seems to me a violation of its role."

In March, in response to criticism after its logo appeared on an ad for the Kushner event, identifying it as a Koffler sponsor, the federation released a statement distancing itself from the talk because Kushner is on the advisory board of Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP), a group that supports BDS.

The federation said that although Kushner himself "has publicly stated that he does not support the BDS movement, UJA Federation has concerns about [his] association with JVP, and we will not support an event where there is any link to organizations supporting BDS."

Kushner responded to the federation's statement in an interview with The Globe and Mail published May 8, in which he accused the federation of "McCarthyism" and referred to its distancing itself from the event as a "smear campaign."

At the Koffler event, Kushner said that as a gay Jewish man who grew up in the American South in the 1960s when the civil rights movement was "reaching its apogee," he's always felt a responsibility to "say the truth."

While he stressed that he doesn't consider himself an expert on the "Israeli-Palestinian crisis," he said it's an issue he's thought a lot about, and that when people ask him about it, he feels, "a moral obligation that comes directly from the ethical teachings I received as a young Jewish kid to tell the truth as I see it and engage in discussion."

Kushner said that "in Israel, the [room for] debate is infinitely greater."

He added: "The UJA, in deciding that this event was too dangerous for Jews to listen to, is upholding a fantasy version of the State of Israel and a fantasy version of Israeli policy."

Morris Zbar, federation president and CEO, said later, "We refuse to offer a platform to anyone affiliated with an organization endorsing BDS, which aims for the destruction of the State of Israel. Mr. Kushner sits on the advisory board of a leading BDS organization in the United States. That is his right. And UJA has the right to affirm our fundamental principles and reject BDS in all of its forms." ■

ASK ELLA

Young or old, parenting is never easy

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

My parents raised both my brother and me to be caring and responsible. We are both working adults with families of our own. My father died two years ago, and now, our elderly mother, who lives on her own, needs help.

I speak to her every day and see her at least three to four times a week. I do her shopping, take her to appointments and help with her hygiene. What does my brother do? Nothing! He barely calls, and she's fine with that, because he is a "busy man." Her care seems to have landed squarely on my shoulders. In her eyes, I'm the daughter, and it's expected of me.

How do I rectify this injustice without causing a rift between my brother and me?

Not Woman's Work

Dear Not Woman's Work

I don't think it's that unusual for people of your mother's generation to feel that taking care of anything domestic is women's work and bringing home a paycheque is men's work, which, to her, absolves your brother from having to help with her care.

This explains why she is happy with just a periodic phone call. There's little point in trying to change your mother's expectations. The family dynamics have been set, and it's clear your mom's relationship with you and your brother are very different.

The problem is lack of communication with your brother. He is going about his life very content that mom is well cared for, and there is no reason he needs to be involved. Perhaps if he realized the physical and emotional burden you are dealing with, he would step up.

It's your place to get that message across to him, but do it rationally and logically, not when you're emotional and heated. Have solutions in place to offer as suggestions, such as a schedule or perhaps pooling family money together to get support for caregivers, or, if you can afford it, even a retirement residence where your mother can also enjoy some social time to add quality to her life.

You've been a wonderful daughter. Don't let that turn into resentment. Believe me when I say you will never be sorry for doing all that you can for your mother.

Dear Ella,

I'm on the road a lot and often find it more convenient to meet with clients in restaurants rather than have them come to my office. I can't begin to tell you how often my meetings are plagued by the poor behaviour of children and even poorer behaviour of their parents. Sitting in a booth, I can be accosted by a child standing in the booth behind me, yelling, spitting food and making faces at my client. When I ask the accompanying parent politely to handle the situation, I am more often than not snubbed, ignored or told off.

I have asked waiters to help, and if possible, they move me to another table, which is disruptive during a meeting. The offending tot and guardian are the ones who should be moved. Don't you agree? I don't get why parents think this behaviour is acceptable in public.

Seen and Not Heard

Dear Seen and Not Heard

The convenience of conducting business in a restaurant nearby can save both you and your client valuable time. However, it is not an office, and you have no control of who will be there. Perhaps do a bit of investigating in the area where you plan to meet and stay away from family-type establishments. Try a coffee shop or neighbourhood bar instead. For lunch, go to an upscale restaurant and be prepared for a larger tab. The choice is yours. You can only control so much, and if you choose to meet at a family restaurant, you are taking your chances. Not all parents will meet with your approval. Don't try to change them. The changing in this case rests with you and your choices. ■

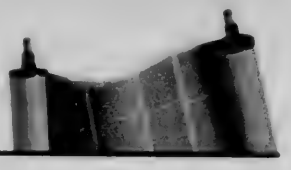
Parshah

Emor | Leviticus 21:1-24:23



Rabbi Ilan Acoca says an emphasis on education is one of the main reasons the Jewish nation has survived
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl examines why the Omer period is a time of anxiety and anticipation
Rabbi Catharine Clark reflects on the physical and spiritual foundations of the holiday of Shavuot

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

This week's parshah starts with a commandment given to the kohanim.

The Torah says, "HaShem said to Moses: Say to the kohanim, the sons of Aaron, and tell them: each of you, shall not contaminate himself to a [dead] person among his people."

It seems as if the language is redundant, since the Torah says to "say" to the kohanim and repeats again the instruction to "tell" them. Rashi answers that it was not enough for the adult kohanim to keep this commandment, but it was also intended that the children of the kohanim should observe the commandment. The Torah therefore repeats it a second time. The first is for the adult kohanim, the second is for their children.

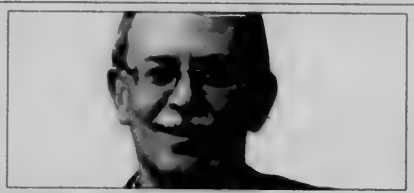
What Rashi is teaching us is something that the Jewish People have always excelled in – education. Education has always been a priority wherever we lived. In fact, I believe that one of the main the reasons the Jewish nation has survived was that they put great emphasis on education.

As a Sephardi rabbi of the only Sephardi congregation west of Toronto, I have numerous opportunities to educate about Sephardi Judaism.

I am often asked why I spend so much time teaching, writing and speaking about Sephardi Judaism. Wouldn't it be simpler to be part of a big melting pot? My answer is simple. I do it because I owe it to my ancestors. I believe it is the responsibility of every Sephardi Jew, and especially the rabbis and lay leaders, to do whatever they can to keep alive the rich Sephardi Judaism of the past by educating the new generation and transmitting it to them. As challenging as it might be at times, we have to do it.

May God give us the opportunity to educate and live harmoniously by respecting our differences. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.



Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

The Torah portion of Emor includes in it the mitzvah of the offering of an omer of barley and the counting that links Pesach to Shavuot. It came to be associated with the span of days designating the passage from the servitude of Egypt to the proclamation at Sinai of God's word and command.

Anxiety, according to psychologists, is often evidenced by counting. People count days, anticipating something big with excitement, as well as anxiety. Rabbi Jacob Milgrom suggests that our agricultural ancestors may have counted the days of the Omer as a ritual response to anxiety about the agricultural yield of the season. The period of chamsin, which also means 50, occurs from late March through late May, when the hot dry winds sweep desert dust throughout the Middle East.

The harvest would be affected if there was too much moisture or too little rain. As the Mishnah (Rosh Hashanah 1:2) teaches, "The world is judged regarding grain on Pesach."

The rabbis of the Talmud remembered the 50-day interval not only for the anticipation of the love-embrace of God and the people of Israel at Shavuot, but also because of the fearful period of Roman persecution in the first half of the second century. In medieval Christian communities, the Omer period became a time when Jews feared attacks because of the "teaching of contempt" linked to Easter.

In the 20th century, the period between Pesach and Shavuot became associated with contemporary trauma. Holocaust remembrance (Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah) and the sacrifices to create and defend the State of Israel, marked on Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day), added new layers of angst. Thankfully, these 50 days also include the celebration of Lag b'Omer and, in contemporary times, of Israel Independence Day.

The Omer period remains a time of anxiety and anticipation. ■

Rabbi Catharine Clark

In our siddur, the sages refer to Shavuot as Zman Matan Torahteinu, "the time of the giving of our Torah." However, Parshat Emor describes Shavuot as falling 50 days after Passover and as the time when an offering of new grain is brought before the Lord. It never uses the term the sages give to the holiday.

In a strong statement that Judaism is a rabbinic, rather than a biblical, religion, a number of commentaries ask how the Torah could omit such an important rabbinic concept from its decree about the holiday.

Abarbanel, the 15th-century scholar and statesman, answers that the giving of the Torah is not the basis of the festival, because Shavuot was not given by God in remembrance of this event. Rather, according to Abarbanel, the basis of Shavuot is the beginning of the wheat harvest. Just as Parshat Emor says, Shavuot is an agricultural holiday.

Nechama Leibowitz, the 20th-century Israeli scholar, is harsh in her dismissal of Abarbanel's interpretation. According to her, those who consider Shavuot an agricultural holiday are pagans who elevate materialist indulgence above the spiritual concerns of the Torah. To her, Shavuot is important because it is when we entered into a covenantal relationship with God.

Our better approach is to celebrate Shavuot as a combination of Parshat Emor and the sages, and to view the holiday from a position in between that of Abarbanel and Leibowitz.

We are human. Therefore, we eat, and the agricultural cycle deserves our grateful attention. We are human, formed in God's image. Therefore, food is not enough, and we must celebrate the great gift of Torah that God has given us. The physical and spiritual are the paired foundations of our joy on Shavuot. ■

European delicacies inspired Chimney Stax.

Mobile bakery turns its sights on bricks-and-mortar site

DAVID SILVERBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When he was a teenager, Zach Fiksel could have never predicted his hours helping his mom bake challah for Shabbat dinner would be the prelude to his full-time career at age 35: being co-owner of the food truck Chimney Stax, where he sells hand-rolled, rotisserie-baked bread.

For two years, Fiksel and his business partner Matt Lindzon, 30, have been driving around Toronto with a truck chock full of savoury and sweet chimney cakes, a dessert made popular hundreds of years ago in Prague, Hungary and Romania.

Now, Lindzon and Fiksel are enjoying a profitable business that has inspired them to create their first bricks-and-mortar site, at Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue in North York, to act as a company headquarters.

"We want a scalable business and didn't want to live and die in that truck," says Lindzon in a joint interview with Fiksel in a downtown restaurant.

"We're excited for this summer," adds Fiksel, "because now we're getting recognized and people are saying 'Oh yeah it's you guys!'"

If you frequent downtown Toronto concerts or events, chances are you'll spot their truck and that smell of fresh baked bread. They'll be selling their "stax" at the Good Food and Wine Festival April 23 and 24, at the Field Trip Music Festival June 3 and 4, and at Molson Amphitheatre concerts such as the Dave Matthews Band on July 19.

What makes their product unique is how simple it is, while also being fun to eat. Baked and never fried, the dough is rolled around in various ingredients, depending if the treat is savoury or sweet. The cheesy garlic bread option is often quite popular, as well as sandwich-type stax filled with meat and vegetables. Fiksel notes future stax will include high-quality ingredients such as brisket, and they also plan to launch braided challah stax in September.

Why are stax fun? You can peel off the dough like you're unraveling a spiral, chowing down on strand after strand.

"What sets us apart is we don't go overboard with ingredients," notes Lindzon. "We're not making a 15-ingredient garlic aioli. We like to keep it simple."

Lindzon and Fiksel became friends in Ryerson University's business program and quickly began to work on school projects together. When Lindzon travelled to Austria on business, he spotted a booth making chimney cakes and sent Fiksel a WhatsApp message at midnight, Toronto time.

It simply read: "We are doing this!"

Chimney Stax was quickly born, with the duo opting to go the food truck route instead of launching a physical site in early 2014.

"With Toronto's growing love of food trucks, getting in the market with a truck was a great way to launch this at various events and a good way to scale into an industry," Lindzon says.

It also made strategic sense: they had to prove their concept was going to win over Torontonians, and investing in a restaurant would be too risky. Educating foodies about these chimney cakes was an essential first step, and something that could be done easily with a food truck parked at dozens of arts and food-related events.

They have brought their truck to many concerts and sites such as the Christmas Market at the Distillery District, where they caught attention of Michele Henry of the Toronto Star and received some impressive media attention.

The pair say their skills complement each other, which helps them organize their schedules efficiently. Fiksel manages the operations side of Chimney Stax, such as running the hands-on management of the truck and the customer outreach. Lindzon applies his finance management background to the business, and is in charge of finding new opportunities.

Working together has enlightened both of them on their own entrepreneurial spirits.

"What I learned about myself is that I work better with a partner," says Fiksel. "And we're both great problem solvers, so when an issue comes up, we see them as challenges, not hindrances."

The truck has an aggressive summer schedule ahead, says Lindzon, and "I know we can pull it off, because we have faith in each other. And accountability is self-motivating." ■

Geoffrey Clarfield: on Israel and the 'family of moral issues'

LILA BARICK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Geoffrey Clarfield is executive director of Mozuud, a Canadian non-profit organization that advocates on behalf of Israel, and a host of other social justice issues, including opposing female genital mutilation, the slaughter of African elephants for ivory, and the persecution of the Yazidi people, a minority religion in Iraq.

Clarfield, 62, spent 16 years in east Africa working in international development before returning a decade ago to his hometown of Toronto.

What does Mozuud mean ?

Mozuud is Urdu, which is the literary language of contemporary Pakistan, and means "to be accounted for, to be present."

We wanted to choose a name from the multi-ethnic fabric of Canada. It's a kind of call to self-examination and if that works and people go to our website and get attracted to the campaigns and petitions that we invite them to join, all the better.

How did Mozuud start?

It started officially just a year ago, but it had a 10-year gestation. Ten years ago, when the official institutions of Canada were somewhat anti-Israel, a number of people in the Jewish community felt that we weren't organized effectively to promote Israel, and it was felt that especially after the Holocaust, there will never be enough Jews to defend the State of Israel in the back-and-forth of politics and democratic debate, so there was a need to establish alliances, and it was felt that it was a reasonable thing to conceive of Israel as one of a number of threatened democracies.

So a number of people got together and formed the Canadian Coalition for Democracies, which would lobby in favour of Israel, Taiwan, South Korea, India, and not only threatened democracies, but threatened people around the world.

The CCD dissolved because it succeeded beyond its wildest expectations. They unconsciously felt that things were going so well that some of the verve and some of the focus was lost.

About five years ago, I felt that just writing in the papers here and in the United States and England was not enough, and Irving Weisdorf, a founder of CCD, showed up and started planning Mozuud. He felt it would be similar to the CCD, but much more 21st century and much more website-based, much more petition-based and reaching out to various interest groups, because in the digital age, not everyone supports all the campaigns, and individuals are a configuration of moral commitments.

Geoffrey Clarfield, executive director of Mozuud

> We've done an enormous amount of lobbying at the government level with the previous government

So Mozuud is designed with that in mind, to have a very strong central pro-Israel content, but also to relate to those issues that are morally similar to Israel, and the most outstanding are the Yazidi, which is a major campaign we're involved with.

Does Mozuud have a political stance?

No, we're much more issue-based. We feel that whoever is pro-democracy and pro-human rights is going to be pro-Israel, and so we're looking for those people. We're not in support of any particular party.

How many members do you have?

It's a digital world. We have a reach of 8,000 people through our website, email blasts and Twitter.

What are the organization's goals?

We hope to provide an organization that allows not just Canadians, but people from around the world to recognize that there's a configuration of moral issues. Israel's at the centre of it, because after the Holocaust, it's still disproportionately threatened, but it has allies, and there are other countries and peoples in similar situations.

We're trying to grow the organization so that it becomes an umbrella for people with overlapping and complementary moral outlooks who can act in a certain way. Very often people will see a certain issue, they'll write a letter to their MP, they'll have a house meeting, they'll find a charity to donate some money, and then it stops.

We're a kind of incubator for 21st-century moral activists.

What are you currently doing?

The website is central. We have petitions and campaigns and we get people to sign them and write to various authorities. We're very concerned with the Yazidis. The similarity between the way the Yazidis are being treated and the way the Jews of the Middle East, specifically the Jews of Iraq, were treated historically, is just stunning. Very early on, we came to the attention of the Yazidi human rights organizations and they came to us and said, "What can we do together?"

We've done an enormous amount of lobbying at the government level with the previous government. We've tried to find out who the players are in Yazidi human rights. We're also helping Yazidis to bring their families to Canada. Thousands of Yazidis are in refugee camps in places like Turkey and Jordan, and if they experience the persecution of jihadis when they were on the run and being chased by ISIS and enslaved and raped and killed, they're not treated very well in the camps, either, because they're often run by people who are sympathetic to radical Islam.

We're trying to get some immigration equality here. The government has decided to almost solely focus on Syrian refugees. We know from inside the refugee organizations that 99.9 per cent of the people coming from Syria are Sunni Muslim Arabs. And that's not to say they haven't suffered in this terrible civil war, but the people who have suffered equally, if not more, are the minorities.

The reason why the government has closed down on Iraqi refugees and opened the spigot on Syria is un-transparent and unfathomable.

What if people support some of the causes Mozuud represents, but not its position on Israel?

We believe these are a configuration of moral issues that are related, but that doesn't mean they are identical. You choose the issue or the range of issues. If you agree with us all the way, that's great. If you agree with us some of the way, that's great.

With regards to our position about Israel, it's really about international law. Israel has rights to all land west of the Jordan River. That does not mean that Israel, when it is negotiating final status, has to keep all land west of the Jordan, but if the general public, Jewish and not Jewish, is not sufficiently aware that Israel has rights there and they are there by right and not might, then we are contributing to the big lie. It's historically and legally informed, and it's an absolutely essential piece of truth that we, and many of the organizations we work with, feel has to go out there because we feel that it will contribute to a just and lasting solution in the region.

What is the unifying thread to the causes you support?

Many of the campaigns that we have adopted or support are morally related to Judeo-Christian ethics on a number of levels.

For example, there's a passage in the Bible that says something like God gave humans the reign over animals. Animal activists might argue about what that means, but I think it means responsible stewardship. Something like the ivory trade, which is perhaps going to destroy the existence of the elephant itself, also causes enormous violence to the villagers who live near elephants. I know this from my personal experience in Africa.

Unfortunately, Al-Shabaab, an Islamist group in Somalia, is deriving 40 per cent of its funding by poaching elephants and creating havoc and terror in the Horn of Africa.

How does your Jewish background inform the work that you do?

It goes back to the Judeo-Christian ethic. The international development and NGO movement and far too many charities are powerfully influenced by Marxism, and Marxism has a powerful anti-Israel subtext to it. I feel that in doing this work, I'm fulfilling not only the Judeo-Christian ethic, but we're also showing responsibility to a variety of international issues that should not be monopolized in any way by any specific ideology. ■

Toronto's fleet-footed Jewish maiden

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE

Recently, the Bank of Canada announced its list of 12 distinguished Canadian women, one of whom will be immortalized on a new series of bank notes. Predictably, the list includes Nellie McClung, who battled for women's voting rights, artist Emily Carr, and Lucy Maud Montgomery, the author of Anne of Green Gables. Among the long shots – and the only Jewish woman to make the cut – is Fanny "Bobbie" Rosenfeld, one of Canada's greatest woman athletes.

Rosenfeld, who died in 1969 at the age of 66, would have relished the challenge of the contest. An all-around athlete, she excelled at track and field, ice hockey, basketball, softball and tennis. Her most celebrated achievement was at the 1928 Summer Olympics in Amsterdam, as one of the "Matchless Six," the six Canadian women who competed for the first time in track and field events. She won a gold medal as a member of the 400-metre relay team, a silver medal for the "disputed" 100-metre sprint, which she in fact likely won, and placed fifth in the 800-metre race and allowed an injured teammate to finish ahead of her in what was considered at the time a magnanimous act of sportsmanship. A Globe sports reporter called her "Toronto's fleet-footed Jewish maiden."

She held many Canadian sports records and in 1950 was named Canada's outstanding female athlete of the first-half of the 20th century. By then, she had been writing a popular sports column for the Globe and Mail for many years.

Rosenfeld was born in February 1904 in a town in the Pale of Settlement. Her parents, Max and Sarah, brought her and her two-year old brother, Maurice, to Canada in late 1905. Max's elder brother lived in Barrie, Ont., so that's where the family ended up.

Max and Sarah had named her Fanny. But after she "bobbed" her hair as a young woman – more out of practicality for sports purposes than as a fashion statement – she was dubbed "Bobbie." Her skills and talent as an athlete were evident by the time she was in Grade 9. "Wiry, strong and quick," as her biographer Anne Dublin describes her, Rosenfeld started winning track and field competitions in junior high school and never looked back.

> Rosenfeld helped to pave the way for the emergence of the modern woman of sport.

The family relocated to Toronto in 1922, where she quickly became a sports star at Harbord Collegiate, the YMCA and later at the YMHA on Brunswick Avenue. In those days, as Dublin also notes, young women, who wanted to compete in sports were compelled to wear long skirts or bloomers. Not Bobbie, however. Causing controversy, she wore her brother's baggy shorts and a T-shirt or jersey. "What was a gal to do?" Rosenfeld wrote in a January 1940 column on the subject of her attire. "With unflagging effort we tried all over town to purchase raiment in accordance with what the best-dressed sprinter was wearing, so that we could discard our modesty-preserving pup-tent bloomers, spinnaker middy and hip-length stockings. But girl athletes were as yet in the neophyte stage and sporting goods houses proved an absolute blank... so we had to improvise our new and less blush-saving garments."

Fiercely competitive, she rarely backed down from a sports competition or a challenge. One obstacle, however she could not overcome was arthritis, which afflicted her for the first time in 1929, when she was only 25 years old. Ultimately forced to retire as an athlete in 1933, she reinvented herself as a sports columnist. In her writing, she rarely missed an opportunity to advocate for women and minorities in amateur and professional sports.

Bobbie Rosenfeld Park was established by the city of Toronto in 1991 in an area between Rogers Centre and the CN Tower. In a 2013 academic article about her life and career, University of Windsor historians Christina Burr and Carol A. Reader assert that in the larger perspective, "through her displays of outstanding athleticism and techniques of appearing, Rosenfeld helped to pave the way for the emergence of the modern woman of sport in interwar Canada – a representation of womanhood that was hugely contested at the time." ■

Historian Allan Levine's most recent book is Toronto: Biography of a City.

Entitlement to Support despite Prenuptial Agreement

CLE Seminar

Charles Wagner
Wagner Sidlofsky LLP
Chair, Trusts & Estates

Most people would be surprised to find out that the best prenuptial agreement in the world will not stop the surviving spouse from successfully suing the estate for support. In the upcoming B'nai Brith Estates and Trusts CLE seminar, lawyers and accountants will review this issue in a moot court setting.

Charles Ticker
Charles B. Ticker Law O-ffice

When wealthy people marry, their lawyers often advise them to ensure that their fiancé signs a prenuptial agreement. The goal is to protect the wealthy person's family in case, the marriage breaks up and/or the wealthy spouse dies. So, if the couple each hire good lawyers and the prenuptial contract clearly spells out their agreement, is that 'pre-nup' still open to challenge? Maybe. Let's look at the law.

Under the Succession Law Reform Act, a prenuptial agreement is only one factor the court has to take into consideration when deciding if the estate should pay support to a surviving spouse. The legislation specifically provides that the court has the discretion to ignore the agreement.

Brendan Donovan
Wagner Sidlofsky LLP

When a couple sign a prenuptial agreement and the surviving spouse feels she wants to sue the estate, lawyers ask a lot of questions which include: (1) does the prenuptial agreement provide adequate support; (2) if not, does the obligation to support your spouse under the Family Law Act and common law get cancelled by the domestic contract? One case that dealt with this issue was the Butts Estate v. Butts case ("Butts"). In Butts Estate v Butts, despite the fact that there was a contract where both parties fully understood the terms of their agreement, the court decided that the support provided was insufficient and increased support payments to be paid by the estate to the separated wife by $1,000 per month.

Wynn Harvey
Touchpointe Strategies, Inc.

There are a number of other factors a court takes into account when determining the quantum of support. Part of the moot court will demonstrate how the surviving spouse might argue his or her case. Charles Ticker of Charles B. Ticker law office will be the lawyer for the surviving spouse examining Wynn Harvey of Touchpointe Strategies, Inc. Brendan Donovan of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP will be conducting the cross-examination. As an economist, Wynn has prepared a report on the case factoring in the surviving spouse's health, age and ability to support himself to arrive at a figure of what he will need to accommodate his lifestyle for the rest of his life. Attendees will learn what factors the courts take into account in these circumstances and how astute counsel conduct examinations in chief and cross-examinations.

The event will take place on June 21, 2016, at Shaarei Shomayim-Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M6N 1V8, and is open to lawyers and accountants. Please contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca.

Rabbis make hoops wager, and terror suspect gets house arrest

A friendly bet on Raps-Cavs

There's more at stake than just a trip to the NBA finals in the playoff series between the Toronto Raptors and LeBron James' Cleveland Cavaliers: two Conservative rabbis are making things interesting with a friendly wager. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Rabbi Stephen Weiss, of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation and Cleveland's B'nai Jeshurun Congregation, respectively, are betting either a bottle "of the finest Canadian Club" if the Cavs win or a selection of fine brews from Great Lakes Brewery if the Raps win. "Rabbi Weiss and I are friendly rivals for this series," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. "The bet is mostly just for fun. Also, our supply of quality schnapps for Shabbat kiddush is running low," said Rabbi Weiss.

Shul bombing trial continues

A Lebanon-born former lecturer at two Ottawa universities who was extradited to France in 2014 to stand trial for killing four people in a 1980 Paris synagogue bombing was released to house arrest. In his ruling this month, a high court magistrate who reviews incarceration appeals cited "doubt on the fundamental question" of whether Hassan Diab was in Frarice when a bomb went off on Oct. 3, 1980, outside a synagogue on Copernic Street. The trial is ongoing and the prosecution intends to appeal Diab's release. Diab fought his extradition from Canada for six years. French authorities allege he was a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and took part in the bombing. Diab, a dual Lebanese and Canadian citizen, denies the allegations.

French comic performs via video link

Controversial French comedian Dieudonné had what he believes is the last laugh when he presented a virtual show in Montreal on May 16, almost a week after border agents at Trudeau Airport returned him to Paris, apparently because of his lengthy hate speech criminal record. About 700 people reportedly attended his live presentation by video link from France, held at a reception hall in St. Leonard, paying $50 to $60 per ticket. The show was to have run for 10 performances at a small art gallery, then tour to Quebec City and Trois-Rivières. ■

A message from the Shoah

On our way to the death camps in Transnistria, I saw messages left behind on the walls of the empty Jewish houses with the following words, "We are being killed. If you survive, please tell the world what happened to us, say Kaddish for us and don't ever forget us."

When I read these messages at the age of 12, I took an oath that day that if I survived I would to the best of my ability fulfil their last wish. I believe that most of the survivors of the Holocaust carried within their hearts and minds the need to tell their stories but there was no one ready to listen. It took 20 or 30 years, starting with the Diary of Anne Frank and the books of Eli Wiesel, before the Holocaust story took on a life of its own. Personal testimonies, documentaries, Holocaust education centres, thousands upon thousands of books and the establishment of Yad Vashem in Jerusalem brought to the attention of the whole world to what really happened to the Jewish People. The loss of six million, including 1.5 million children, was forever recorded into the darkest chapters of human history, never to be erased.

No sooner was the truth brought to the attention of the world, then the deniers started to discredit the story of the Holocaust. But the evidence was everywhere. Auschwitz Birkenau, the gas chambers, the crematoriums, the hundreds of other concentration and death camps, the mass graves at Babi Yar are all a stark reminder of what really happened.

The survivors, the witnesses to this greatest tragedy in the history of the Jewish People, have fulfilled their duty to tell the world what really happened. But in time, all the survivors will be gone to their eternal resting places. Who will then speak for them? The legacy that they left behind will be inherited by their children, grandchildren and future generations who will protect this legacy and make sure the last wish by those who perished will be honoured and never forgotten.

Leizer Hoffer, past president of Transnistria Survivors Association

Responses to Schulich

An open letter to Seymour Schulich:

We, a group, of Hasbara Fellowships student leaders and recent alumni of York University, are writing in response to the story in The CJN, ("Jews should stop 'whining' about York U, benefactor says," May 12).

We acknowledge your generosity toward Israel. You have donated tens of millions of dollars to Israel, and invested in its economy. There is no doubt that you are a devoted Zionist and proud supporter of Israel. For that we are deeply grateful.

For us, students and recent graduates of York, and Hasbara Fellows, York has been home to a staggering amount of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic propaganda in recent years, from boycott, divestment and sanctions votes to hateful graffiti to incendiary speakers, and much more.

We know all this because we have experienced it first-hand. We know the challenges facing Jewish students at York, and we are offended by your comments that we leave our identity at the door and accept that the solution for defeating anti-Semitic propaganda is to minimize our Jewishness.

Not only do we find the comments offensive, but they are not a solution. Hiding our identities as Jews will not satisfy the demands of anti-Semites, as history attests well. We ask that you apologize for your comments and that you use your power and influence at York to ensure that this university becomes a safe and welcoming place for all its Jewish students.

How could we Jews have been so obtuse? Jews should just fit in, not stand out. Forget the Magen David around the neck, do not wear kippot or have hair with payot around the ears, and of course do not associate together in groups with other Jews. And I nearly forgot, do not take "arts courses" for a bachelor degree, as you will have too much free time to create problems that do not exist.

What else should we avoid? Do not make enough money to fund a school in a university with your Jewish name on it, since that only feeds the urban myth that Jews have all the money.

RABBI 2 RABBI

Do Jews mourn too much?

Memorial customs are appropriate if they're commemorative, but we also need compelling reasons to teach Judaism that aren't about past losses

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: The Talmud relates that following the destruction of the Second Temple, many Jews chose to deny themselves life's pleasures as a sign of their deep mourning. Rabbi Joshua chided them by saying: "Not to mourn is impossible… but to mourn too much is also impossible."

These words come to mind as I contemplate the heavy dose of mourning at this time of the Jewish year. Beginning with Yizkor on the last day of Pesach, continuing with the mourning traditions of sfirat haOmer, when weddings and celebrations are deferred, and including the contemporary additions of Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron, we find ourselves surrounded by sorrow. However, Lag b'Omer, now upon us, represents a respite from this mourning season – for some, marking its end, for others, just a one-day breach in the sea of sadness.

Don't get me wrong: I am not advocating the cancellation of any of these mourning traditions. But I am still troubled by Rabbi Joshua's warning. Do we, as Jews, mourn too much?

Rabbi Finegold: There seems to be a tightrope that we are asked to walk as educators today. On the one hand, "Never Forget" is a message we are supposed to tell the next generation as they mature, reminding them that soon there will be no more survivors who are first-hand witnesses to what happened in the Holocaust. On the other hand, the very same generation tells us they don't feel the narrative of Holocaust Judaism resonates and we need to find something more compelling to make Jewish life more attractive.

I do think we mourn too much as a community, and not because we have sfirat haOmer and Yom Hashoah and Tisha b'Av, but because we have turned those moments into reasons for being Jewish – as in, "Don't intermarry, we lost enough people in the Holocaust."

This is not a compelling reason, and I doubt it ever was. I think it would be fine and appropriate to keep every mourning custom we have, as long as they remain commemorations. But we should also be searching for compelling reasons to teach Judaism that have nothing to do with our past losses.

Creating a narrative of life, wisdom and love should be more than enough to overcome any sadness and loss.

Rabbi Scheim: In my congregational rabbinic work, much of my time is devoted to individualized mourning. Here, on the surface, the Jewish laws of mourning can seem intense and potentially overwhelming. But as you correctly suggest, the enduring narrative needs to be positive, centred in learning, in enjoyable religious practice and in a comforting spiritual environment.

Mourners who say Kaddish regularly find great comfort, friendship and support in the daily minyan. Even though sadness propelled them into the daily prayer ritual, over time, that sadness is transformed into a positive, optimistic, energetic involvement in Judaism that until then may have eluded the mourner, but now becomes the entrance-way to a new, revitalized, enthusiastic commitment to Jewish life and the Jewish future.

Rabbi Finegold: Imagine if the same thing happened with those who came to shul for Yizkor or for a Yom Hashoah commemoration. While not every Kaddish reciter continues to come to minyan after their year of Kaddish, many do, and we need to find out how they navigated that transition from sadness into joy and use those ideas to craft programs around Yizkor and the like.

A good place to start would be with those who have the custom to leave during Yizkor because they have living parents. The message currently being sent to them is that in times of communal mourning, you do not belong because you have nothing to be sad about. Maybe we could create a parallel program, however brief, that includes them in a different manner.

Imagine if after Yizkor we invite the next generations who have left the sanctuary to reflect on what the deceased meant to them and how they intend to do better in the world because of the example set by their grandparents and great-grandparents. This could open the eyes of the Yizkor reciters, as well as those that are silent during Yizkor, to have that new revitalized commitment to Judaism. ■

The time a CJN ad taught Canada a valuable lesson

It started with a tiny classified listing in the May 12 CJN: "To Howard Rosen," the three-line advertisement read, "sorry I punched you at Runnymede Public School in the early 1960s. Tom Caldwell."

Within days, one man's unique apology had gone viral.

The first outlet to pick up the story was 12:36, a Toronto tabloid newsletter distributed daily by email, under the cheeky headline "New business model for newspaper classifieds." "The founder of Caldwell Securities could set off a new repentance trend with the ad he placed in The Canadian Jewish News to apologize for an elementary school incident dating back about 65 years," the story read.

Caldwell's mea culpa gained steam quickly. Soon after the 12:36 article, BuzzFeed Canada managed to get in touch with the Order of Canada recipient, who explained, "I didn't have any grand design here, it was just a little ad in a paper and if the guy happened to see it, fine… Maybe it's an encouragement for people who have been subjected to that [kind of treatment] at whatever age that sometimes people can change."

Some of BuzzFeed's mostly millennial commenters were suspicious of Caldwell's motivations, speculating that the ad was a clever ruse to drum up some publicity for his business properties. But one commenter offered a particularly bright – and wholly Canadian – assessment: "I sometimes get annoyed about Canadian stereotypes," she wrote, "but then I remember that time a guy took out an ad in a newspaper to say sorry about something that happened over 50 yrs ago. LOL Oooh Canada."

By the end of the week, the story of Caldwell's apology was being picked up by even more media outlets. Caldwell made an appearance on CBC Radio's Metro Morning in Toronto, and the public broadcaster later published a story online under the headline, "A man with regrets: Torontonian says sorry for anti-Semitic act in 1950s." According to the Toronto Star's version of story, "There was no reason for the punch, Caldwell admitted, though Rosen being a Jewish kid probably had something to do with it, which Caldwell said adds to his guilt now." Le Journal de Montréal opted for the headline, "Il s'excuse 65 ans plus tard pour un coup de poing." The news spread beyond Canada, too, with Minnesota Public Radio, the Irish Sun and U.K. Mirror, among others, getting in on the action.

One question still remained: where was Howard Rosen, and was he aware of his newfound fame?

As it turned out, he was.

"My niece was browsing through The CJN… and saw [the ad]," Rosen told CJN reporter Paul Lungen (for more, see page 12). And while he only had a hazy memory of being punched all those years ago, and seems to have had little trouble moving on after the event, – "It was one day in my life. Nothing out of the ordinary. There was a certain level of persecution in those days," he told Lungen – the retired teacher decided to call Caldwell.

They've now spoken several times, and even met face-to-face.

The moral of the story: it's never too late to say you're sorry. You never know who is going to be listening. ■ – YONI

ESSAY

Mozart, Casanova and a Jewish poet

Erol Araf

The Czech Museum's recent discovery of a long-lost Mozart composition on Lorenzo Da Ponte's poetry reignited my fascination with Mozart's Jewish librettist, whose "lines had both brilliance and flare," according to Mozart's biographer Marcia Davenport, "[and] struck themes from Wolfgang's imagination like hammers upon flint." This was a combination which gave us masterpieces like The Marriage of Figaro, Don Giovanni and Cosi Fan Tutte: a partnership whose equal has yet to be surpassed.

Our story starts in a hot-punch tavern located on a cobblestone sleepy back alley buried in the immense shadows of Romanesque arches, Gothic ribbed vaults and triumphal Baroque towers ornamenting the ancient city of Prague in 1787. In the alehouse, three men dressed in breeches, powdered wigs, and tricorne hats, engrossed in a discussion, were putting the finishing touches to Don Giovanni: considered by many to be the greatest opera ever composed.

They were Giacomo Casanova, allegedly the greatest lover; Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, indisputably the most sublime composer; and Da Ponte, a gifted poet. The opera's subject is universally seductive, the music surreal, the poetry redolent with pathos, and the story encompasses every emotion familiar to ordinary people ranging from fear to revenge; from lust to anger; and, from passion to tenderness. Little wonder that in a letter to Louise Colet, Gustave Flaubert declared Mozart's Don Giovanni, along with Hamlet and the sea, "the three finest things God ever made."

One suspects that such a perfect libretto could not have been written without the poet being intimately familiar with the subject. The Spanish film director Carlos Saura, in his fictionalized life of Da Ponte, Io, Don Giovanni , comes very close to the truth as he links his early life with the poetry of Mozart's masterpiece. But beyond Da Ponte's lifestyle, in the opera, we also see a canon of Jewish folklore come alive as in the finale when a huge marble statue is turned into flesh to exact vengeance on a murderer. Indeed, the oblique reference to the Yiddish legend of Der Golem was not lost on Czech audiences.

Born to religious Jewish parents in the Venetian ghetto, Da Ponte converted with his family and was baptized in 1763, just after death of his mother and before he reached bar mitzvah age. Although he became a priest, he entertained doubts about doctrinal and moral matters as he found his true spiritual vocation in temporal love. While priest of the church of San Luca, he took a mistress, with whom he had two children. At his 1779 trial, where he was charged with "public concubinage," it was also alleged that he had been living in and running a house of light virtues and gambling.

It was in such a milieu that he met his consigliere in all matters of amore, Casanova. After his expulsion from the Most Serene Republic of Venice, Da Ponte ran, with undiminished ardour, from scandal to scandal throughout Europe. In Dresden, he was caught having simultaneous affairs with his landlady and her daughters as he fell victim to "scheduling conflicts," reminiscent of opera buffa sitcoms. Finally, in Vienna with the help of the composer Salieri, he met Emperor Joseph II and subsequently Mozart, at the residence of Baron Wetzlar, a converted Jew, who supported the composer and wanted to help Da Ponte whom he recognized as a member of the tribe. A renowned Philo-Semite, Mozart embraced his new talented friend. Mozart, had, after all, just like Michelangelo – who had magnificently concealed his love of Judaism in his Sistine Chapel painting – also criticized, obliquely, the anti- Semitism of his time, in his opera Il Seraglio, by depicting the hated Turk, Selim Pasha, as a compassionate man devoid of religious prejudices.

Having lost his position in court, Da Ponte wandered in Europe before landing on the shores of the New World. There, he became a wealthy merchant from Venice, a serious art collector, a sought after bookseller, a lecturer, a noted musicologue, an impresario and finally a devoted husband. Age has a way of taming the way of all flesh; he knew how to sublimate, his mentor Casanova did not.

As a noted Renaissance scholar, he introduced the works of Dante, Petrarch and Alfieri to thousands of students at Colombia College. As a philosopher historian, he continued to espouse the universal values of the French and American revolutions. As a poet of the Enlightenment, he promoted freedom of creativity in the arts. As a humanist, he fought prejudice and poverty by giving generously to many good causes in America. Finally, he staged Don Giovanni, in memory of his friend Mozart, in 1826, in a New York music hall that would eventually become the Metropolitan Opera.

To this day, we do not know where he is buried as his end is shrouded in mystery. However, we do know that he wore a golden Star of David and one can only speculate that he might have decided to return to the faith of his forefathers in the end secretly.

We also do not know where exactly Mozart's earthly remains rest in the Marxer Friedhof cemetery in Vienna, as mass paupers' graves were often disinterred and moved. The same goes for Casanova; his tomb no longer exists as a park was constructed out of the cemetery of St. Barbara's church just outside Castle Dux in Bohemia.

But it does not matter as their Don Giovanni will always remind us of Shelley's The Triumph of Life

".....a gentle trace
Of light diviner than the common sun
Sheds on the common earth, and all the place
Was filled with magic sounds woven into one
Oblivious melody..." ■

Is social justice a partisan issue for Jews?

The merging of Jewish traditions with the moral callings of our times can be a struggle. And sometimes, politics gets in the way

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

A new non-profit social advocacy group, that links elephant poaching, genocide of minority peoples in the Middle East and Africa, and a decidedly right-of-centre approach to the Palestinian-Israeli problem proves that when it comes to social justice these days, it's impossible to predict how political and religious alliances will line up.

Michael Diamond, a Toronto businessman and conservative commentator who is active in the Jewish community, is a supporter of the new group, called Mozuud, which is currently helping Yazidi families, an endangered religious minority group in Iraq, immigrate to Canada.

"You don't need to be uni-dimensional. I'm a very good example of that," says Diamond. "My view on the right to die is far more liberal than the government's, yet in the case of Israel, I don't believe we can implement a two-state solution."

After a divisive federal election campaign and in a time when partisan differences seem to be increasingly entrenched in the Jewish community, any assumption that denominations or individuals will align in predictable ways on social advocacy is problematic.

What is clear is that social action and advocacy are, for many, a key part of Jewish identity. The 2013 Pew survey of American Jews found that over half, 56 per cent of respondents, said "working for justice and equality is essential to what being Jewish means to them," ahead even of values like caring for Israel or being part of the Jewish community.

Rabbi Debra Landsberg, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader at Temple Emanu-El, sees this attitude at her shul, where congregants range "from one end of the spectrum to the other" on how they vote in Canada or express their love for Israel.

"We are clear here that our Jewish commitments do not out of necessity align with political parties or even with particular political thinking," she says.

"I think the impulse to see it might be reflective of the highly partisan world in which we're living right now... but I think it's wrong."

SHUTTERSTOCK PHOTO

As an example, when Rabbi Landsberg's congregation wanted to sponsor a Syrian refugee family, she called her colleague at nearby Kehillat Shaarei Torah, an Orthodox shul, which ended up partnering in the project.

The Reform community has a long legacy of social action, and Temple Emanu-El is renowned for its own history of social activism, but Rabbi Landsberg says she made "a very conscious decision" to partner with an Orthodox shul on the Syrian issue, a cause both synagogues could support.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, who leads Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, a modern Orthodox synagogue in Toronto, says Judaism has always struggled to find the balance between particularism – caring for its own community – and universalism. Recently, however, as Orthodox Judaism has become more comfortable in the larger world, the movement has engaged in both social action and political activism.

"There's a social re-orientation in more traditional parts of the community, people are recognizing they can reach out."

He points to Canadian Orthodox Jewish leaders who have recently joined forces with the Catholic community in the national debate on physician-assisted death.

But even while Jews are often at the forefront of social activism, there are calls from both ends of the political spectrum for organized Judaism to do more in addressing the most challenging issues of our time.

Rabbi Shmuly Yanklowitz, founder of the U.S-based Uri L'Tzedek, which he describes as the "first and only Orthodox social justice organization," says Orthodox Judaism has excelled in taking care of its own, but has traditionally shied away from engaging in larger political issues.

"Just as Orthodoxy has a lot to learn from liberal denominations on how to respond to moral imperatives of our time, liberal denominations have to learn from Orthodoxy how to deeply root social justice ideologically in Torah, intellectually and spiritually," he says in an interview.

Social action in the broader community sometimes competes in Jews' hearts and minds with advocacy for Israel. The rest of the world can worry about immigration reform or climate change, the thinking goes, but Jews need to focus on Israel.

Rabbi Yanklowitz dismisses this way of thinking as dangerous.

"If we were to only advocate for Israel, we would essentially make Judaism totally irrelevant," he says. "When we talk to officials, they should hear us advocating against genocide and poverty as much as they hear us advocating for Israel.

"On the other side, there are a lot of social justice activists who are not supporting Israel. It's our responsibility as Jews to support Israel's safety, but also to support Israel being as moral and upstanding as it can be."

Physician-assisted death heralds an unwelcome change

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

It is almost a certainty that every religion will weigh in on the issue of physician- assisted death (PAD), if they haven't already. And why not? After all, what is a more important issue for religion than life and death? Pretty straightforward, it seems. But not really. As we wade deeper into these turbulent waters, the issue of any religion imposing its values on Canada becomes more contentious.

Personally, I agonize over this. On the one hand, I resist the urge to make any pronouncement on this or any other matter that would impose Jewish values on Canada. On the other hand, how can one remain silent on this critical matter? Is there room in between? Perhaps.

There are universal values shared by most religions that would be irresponsible not to share. These values, it can be argued, are not "right because God said them." Instead, God said them because they are right. This nuance makes a world of difference.

Classical Judaism has been very clear. In Jewish law, no one has the "right" to actively take their life. Suicide is seen as the murder of one's own self, a unique instance wherein perpetrator and victim are one and the same. At the same time, people retain the right to refuse treatment, a right that obviously is not encouraged, but is also not denied.

Parts of this general position do not coalesce with the Canadian consensus, if there is such a consensus. I am, therefore, sensitive not to suggest that Canadians embrace a Jewish position on this matter, even though I would not hesitate to convey to members of the Jewish community a principled opposition to suicide, and by extension, to PAD.

Yet I'm ready to share my concerns about this matter. I do so imbued with traditional Jewish values, deeply rooted religious values, but approaching it as a Canadian and addressing those of different faith persuasions, including those who are persuaded to the disbelief in God.

What is being contemplated in the proposed Bill C-14 runs diametrically contrary to the hallowed objective of physicians to save and enhance life. The implications on the psyche of physicians are enormous. With termination as part of the new medical vocabulary, medical practitioners will have their determination compromised. Naturally, patients will wonder whether their doctors are fully dedicated to their survival.

There are other concerns, including the impact this change could have on the behaviour of the general population. Will this engender a shift in attitude, from fighting through pain to taking the available escape?

Our country is filled with people who went through harrowing times, on the brink of giving up, who are today grateful they didn't take that step, a step from which there is no second chance. Again, this won't happen overnight, but the seeds will have been planted for a more resigned approach to life's challenges, leading to many missed fulfilments and true achievements.

Whether or not one believes in God, this shift is not a welcome change. It's not good for health care. It's not good for doctors and patients. It's not good for our approach to life. It's not good for strengthening our resolve to overcome challenges rather than giving up. Plain and simple, it's not good. Our understandable sensitivity to the suffering of others will come back to bite us.

Our reverence for life and our awe of its sanctity have defined us. The passion to save, the inexhaustible energy to treat, the infinite capacity to care to the last natural breath, these are not merely religious values. They are universal values, Canadian values. They are religiously imbued, but also stand on their own. These are values the right to which we deny at our peril. ■

From admissions to recruitment: attracting the 'maybes'

Daniel Held

When you ask today's parents if they're going to enrol their children in Jewish programs, the resounding response is, "maybe." In a recent study of the Jewishly engaged of York Region, which garnered responses from 4,600 families, in every setting we explored – Jewish early childhood education, day and supplementary schools, day and overnight camps, and synagogues – when asked how likely they are to enrol their children, more respondents said "maybe" than "yes."

The response from the York Region study mirrors the findings of research conducted a year ago on the transition to high school. When we surveyed Toronto day school students in grades 7 and 8 and their parents about the factors weighing on their choice of high school, we noted a trend that the final decision of school was being pushed later and later into Grade 8 and that, increasingly, children shared the decision with their parents.

Couched in political terms, there are more and more undecided swing voters, still debating whether they will enrol their children in these powerful Jewish experiences or not. Whereas once a child's Jewish journey was somewhat prescribed, today, parents and children are undecided, waiting to be convinced of the extent to which they will engage in Jewish educational experiences.

Our community needs to draw a page from the politician's playbook and start campaigning for Jewish engagement. We need leaders who will wake up in the morning and go to sleep at night working to swing these undecideds our way. We need to pound the pavement.

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto is undergoing such a change. While the school historically ran an admissions department, mailing applications to middle school families and (very successfully) waiting for the forms to be returned, based on the findings of the transition study described above, the school is transforming its admissions department into a recruitment department, actively seeking out families and stewarding them towards enrolment.

The growth of the "maybes" points to the need for a new type of Jewish educational leader. In addition to being steeped in Jewish content knowledge and an expert pedagogue, today's successful Jewish educational leader must be an engager, a marketer and a community organizer capable of mobilizing others. The leadership of schools, camps, synagogues, and other Jewish organizations must concentrate not only on ensuring the highest quality (and affordability) of the programs they offer, but also on articulating the value proposition they offer to an increasingly discerning consumer and shouting it from the rooftops.

Centrally, we're working with organizations to hone these skills. For day schools we're collaborating with the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education and the Avi Chai Foundation to enrol schools in an 18-month fellowship program, Atideinu, designed to develop data driven recruitment strategies. For supplementary schools the first cohort of local professionals recently graduated from a recruitment and retention fellowship designed to develop and implement new tactics. We're working on similar professional development for camps, synagogues and others, each of which is being guided by comprehensive market research.

It's not enough, however, for the senior leaders of an organization to transform their own mindsets from admissions to recruitment. Rather, this mantra must reverberate throughout the organization to include teachers, students, parents, grandparents, donors, boards and others. Together we must all serve as ambassadors, turning maybes into yesses.

For decades, it was enough for educational institutions to focus on the quality of education, assured that there would be bums in seats and heads in beds. Today, in a market of maybes, we need pavement pounders, a new cadre of leaders who will focus on ensuring that we turn maybes into yesses, maximizing both the depth and breadth of impact of Jewish education on our community. ■

Theme of war underlies Yehuda Amichai's poetry

Jean M. Gerber

"Sword into plowshare, plowshare into sword..."

There is nothing like cleaning up for Passover. You find things that had long been lying in the bottom of that drawer you had not emptied, thinking that you would get to it soon. Thus it remained hidden until the urge to purge came upon you – that need to clean out all the chametz.

So in this process, I came upon a long-unopened folder of articles written ages ago for the Canadian Jewish Chronicle.

In it was an interview I was privileged to conduct with the late Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai, a timely discovery, since this column appears in the issue for Lag b'Omer.

Actually it is not the Lag b'Omer celebration that I am thinking of, but rather the ugly, horrific, devastating and catastrophic war that the 33rd day of the Omer has as its backdrop: the Bar Kochba war, which ended so tragically at the last fortress of Betar.

Bar Kochba/Bar Kosiba: we have no information on his birth, early years, family, education – only on his leadership of the eponymous uprising. Obviously, he was a charismatic leader, since he raised an army of rebellion a mere 60 years or so after the debacle of 70 CE. What we usually remember about the war are stories of the 10 martyred rabbis, or his army's heroic last stand at Betar. These are stories crafted by wearied survivors of that time, including an account of the cessation of the plague that ravaged his army on Lag b'Omer.

Bar Kochba, despite his early successes, was no messiah. Rabbi Akiva's naming of him (his name was not Bar Kochba) as the messianic "son of a star" drew this reproof: "Akiva, grass will grow out of your cheeks before the Messiah comes."

And so it proved. Rome came down like the proverbial wolf on the fold and demolished Judea. Jerusalem, already half destroyed, was plowed under. Jews were sent fleeing north and west, leaving huge tracts of the land empty. It took several centuries for new towns to be built. The slave markets were over-subscribed with Jewish prisoners. Some ended up in the gladiatorial ring.

No doubt Bar Kochba's soldiers fought believing that they could evict the Romans from their beloved country, not realizing that they were living a dream – the Romans were living the reality. Bar Kochba became a symbol of two divergent trends: failed messianism, or heroic resistance.

For me, Lag b'Omer is a 24-hour period when we can catch our breath, and not a time for wild rejoicing. That said, I found the Lag b'Omer celebrations in Israel to be fun, with bonfires and kids' playtimes extended into the night.

Now back to the present and to poetry. It is no secret that Amichai was not a proponent of messianic expectations, or of the final efficacy of settling problems with war.

"People," he said, "always think their war will be the last."

A poem that he read the evening of our interview so long ago combined hope and reality. He told his audience that if there were any underlying themes to his poetry, they were wars – all the wars of many lifetimes of Jews – and the opposite to war, love.

Here is the version of the poem he offered:

The man under his fig tree
Telephoned the man under his vine
Tonight they definitely might come
Armour-plate the leaves
Secure the tree...
The white lamb said to the wolf
The human race bleeds
And my heart aches
No doubt there'll be close combat soon
At our next meeting we'll discuss it
All the nations – united
We'll stream into Jerusalem
To see if the law went forth from Zion
And meanwhile
Seeing it's now spring there
Pick flowers
And beat sword into plowshare
And plowshare into sword
Then back again and again without stopping
Maybe from so much beating and grinding
The iron of war will die out. ■

Iran deal spin central to controversy around Obama flack

Paul Michaels

Earlier this month a major controversy erupted, and continues to unfold, over David Samuels' lengthy article in the New York Times Magazine about Ben Rhodes, U.S. President Barack Obama's deputy national security adviser.

In the May 8 print edition, under the title, "The storyteller and the president," Samuels profiled the 38-year-old Rhodes who, with a background as a fiction writer, worked his way up to become Obama's principal foreign policy adviser, speechwriter and communications strategist.

"Like Obama, Rhodes is a storyteller who uses a writer's tools to advance an agenda that is packaged as politics but is often quite personal... He is the master shaper and retailer of Obama's foreign-policy narratives at a time when the killer wave of social media has washed away the sand castles of the traditional press," writes Samuels.

No foreign policy issue has been more central to Obama's – and hence Rhodes' – agenda than the Iran nuclear deal, finalized last July after the 2014 interim deal, which were both preceded by (at first secret) talks between Washington and Tehran.

Samuels, who had Rhodes' co-operation, depicts Rhodes as disdainful of the journalists to whom he was "retailing" the deal. Rhodes' shockingly open derision, described by Samuels as Rhodes' "brutal contempt" for the media, has become one of the major controversies of the account.

After describing the immense media shift away from traditional to digital technologies and social media platforms such as Facebook and Twitter, Samuels quotes Rhodes: "All these newspapers used to have foreign bureaus. Now they don't. They call us to explain what's happening in Moscow and Cairo. Most of the outlets are reporting on world events from Washington."

Rhodes continues: "The average reporter we talk to is 27 years old, and their only reporting experience consists of being around political campaigns. That's a sea change. They literally know nothing."

That last line in particular landed Rhodes in hot water with the Washington press corps, who felt insulted by the man responsible for, ostensibly, communicating the administration's position on key issues.

Even if there is an element of truth in what Rhodes claims, why insult them?

To be sure, some reporters uncritically cite what they're fed in White House briefings, but others have remained vigilant and skeptical, especially about the terms of the Iran deal and its background.

Yet Samuels agrees with Rhodes and his assistant, Ned Price that, as Samuels puts it, currently "the most effectively weaponized 140-character idea or quote will almost always carry the day, and it is very difficult for even good reporters to necessarily know where the spin is coming from or why."

So, the argument goes, the new technology, along with cutbacks in mainstream media, is making even "good journalists" dumb.

With respect to selling the Iran deal, Samuels relates that Rhodes deceived the (gullible) media by weaving a narrative according to which Obama began talks in 2013 after the "moderate" Iran president Hassan Rouhani was in charge against the "hardliners."

Nonetheless, as Samuels notes, negotiations actually began in secret in 2012 when the hardliner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was still in power. Yet this is something numerous journalists knew and reported, disproving claims they'd been "spun" by Rhodes, as Samuels reports.

Samuels goes further regarding spin, claiming that "handpicked Beltway insiders like Jeffrey Goldberg of the Atlantic and Laura Rozen of Al-Monitor helped retail the administration's narrative."

Both Goldberg and Rozen have objected vigorously to Samuels' portrayal of them as administration stooges. In his Atlantic column, Goldberg laid out his objections in an exchange with Jake Silverstein, editor-in-chief of the Times Magazine. While conceding that Samuels should have contacted Goldberg for comment, Silverstein has stood behind Samuel's reporting, claiming – redundantly – that everything in Samuel's story is "true and accurate."

But just in case he's wrong, Silverstein assured Goldberg that he's decided to get a ruling from the Times' public editor – another development in this fascinating story. ■

Former schoolmates reunite after apology ad goes viral

plungen@thecjn.ca

There are things from the past that Thomas Caldwell remembers as if they happened yesterday. Like the time back in Grade 2 that he spotted a Jewish kid in the school, Howard Rosen, sitting on a fence in the schoolyard and he decided to pop him one, just because.

Caldwell, 72, today a successful businessman, couldn't get over that schoolyard incident even after the passage of decades. And no wonder. On page 118 of his book, The "Success" Dictionary, he defines the word "past" with the following admonition: "Don't drag past hurts around with you like Jacob Marley's chains. Move forward from today, unburdened."

For 65 years, Caldwell had been dragging around that event from his past that most people would have long forgotten, but from which he has wanted to unburden himself. Back in Grade 2, the principal at Runnymede Public School called him into his office to give an account of what happened, and as a cheeky seven-year-old, his response was that his hand slipped.

Caldwell doesn't remember whether there were any further repercussions, but the incident bothered him over the years – like dragging around Jacob Marley's chains – and last week, after consulting with Jewish friends, he placed a classified ad in The CJN to try to make amends.

The ad read: "To Howard Rosen, sorry I punched you at Runnymede Public School in the early 1950's. Tom Caldwell."

The ad hit social media and quickly went viral, but Rosen said he learned about it through "the Jewish telegraph," the informal low-tech communications network in the Jewish community where one person simply tells another.

"My niece was browsing through The CJN that Friday and saw [the ad]," he said. "Word got around" and his family wanted to know, "Are you that Howard Rosen?" he said.

Since then, Rosen and Caldwell spoke several times on the phone, and last week, they met face to face.

"I knew he wanted to get in touch with me," Rosen said. "I thought it was good to talk to him."

"I'm glad I did it. It was like unfinished business," said Caldwell.

Today Caldwell is chair of Caldwell Financial, a diversified investment company. A past governor of the Toronto Stock Exchange, he was also named to the Order of Canada for his philanthropic endeavours.

He counts Jews among his business associates, charitable partners and friends. One of his charitable works was joining with several Jewish partners in funding Neshama Playground in Forest Hill's Oriole Park that is fully accessible.

Nevertheless, the incident from his youth stayed with him over the years. "I believe [Rosen's] name stuck in my mind because I felt badly about it at the time," he said.

Even in his business, Caldwell stresses acknowledging mistakes and moving on. "I tell portfolio managers there's nothing wrong with making mistakes. But clean it up. Don't remain wrong. Move on. It's the same in life."

Caldwell admits there were other things he did in his youth that he now regrets. As a kid, he used to take money from a local

Thomas Caldwell

Catholic church and spend it on movies and treats. As in the Rosen incident, his conscience bothered him about it, so a few years ago, he decided to make amends. He calculated how much he'd taken and added compound interest at 10 per cent. The sum amounted to thousands of dollars, but Caldwell cut a cheque and made a donation to the church.

Righting the wrong at Runnymede had been on his mind for years. He can't really recall why he hit Rosen. "I didn't grow up in an anti-Semitic world, but kids pick up stuff, like dust in the air.

"I didn't think I was anti-Semitic," he added, though he acknowledged there was anti-Jewish sentiment in the community at the time, and that was likely the underlying reason for the punch.

"That was the thing that troubled me. It was inside my head. I know I punched him because he was Jewish," Caldwell said. "I was thinking of the hurt it caused him and his parents."

But today, Rosen barely remembers the incident. "It's really hazy," he said. "It was one day in my life. Nothing out of the ordinary. There was a certain level of persecution in those days."

In fact, Rosen said, the incident with Caldwell takes a back seat to others involving an older boy at Runnymede, who tormented him by threatening to hurt him and chasing him around the schoolyard.

In that context, the Caldwell incident was, for him, forgettable. "I don't think I was as shocked by being hit. It was not out of the ordinary. There were people who would have liked to hit me every day."

Rosen recalls that the move to the west end neighbourhood near Runnymede PS was controversial – his mother, brother and sister weren't happy about it. But his father, who was a successful grocer, owning a store at Bay and Davenport, wanted a nicer home. They moved into the west end from their old "humble area" around Bathurst and Harbord.

After the move, the family felt "isolated" in that new neighbourhood and soon moved out, Rosen recalled.

His experiences at Runnymede, along with the fact he was a hyperactive kid, played a role in him becoming a teacher, he said.

"I wanted to get into a profession where I could influence people's lives," he said.

Now retired, he worked as a teacher for 37 years, including in inner city schools, with a focus on special education.

Not surprisingly, Rosen found the attention brought on by the ad as coming out of the blue. But after a few pleasant chats with Caldwell, talking about their school days, he's open to developing the new relationship. As it happens, they live fairly close to each other.

"I look forward to meeting Tom," Rosen said before they met. "I love to explore." ■

Toronto rabbi new head of Conservative rabbinical group

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto's Rabbi Philip Scheim says one of the advantages he brings to being the new president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the umbrella group for Conservative rabbis, is that he's not American.

As the first Canadian ever to head the 1,700-member, New York-based RA, Rabbi Scheim says his nationality will bolster his efforts to make the organization more international in scope and reach.

His being Canadian "accentuates the priority to strengthen ourselves as an international movement," Rabbi Scheim told The CJN in an interview. "Because a majority [of members] lived in the United States, there was a tendency over the years to be kind of American-centred."

The Conservative movement has developed a strong presence in Israel, South America and Europe, and Rabbi Scheim has made it a priority to go global.

"The fact that I'm not an American is helpful in that regard," he said.

Rabbi Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue (known as Beth David) since 1984, was scheduled to be installed in his new post May 22 at an event in New York.

He "has emphasized the connection between his congregation and the State of Israel, and the importance of reflecting and exemplifying Canadian values in all of its congregants' endeavours," the RA said in a statement announcing his appointment.

Rabbi Scheim has been an officer of the RA for the past eight years and has served on its committee on Jewish law and standards. He's also a regular contributor to The CJN.

Founded in 1901, the RA has embraced change while adhering to tradition.

"It is precisely this traditional approach, which combines fidelity to inherited tradition and the courage to integrate necessary change, which motivates Conservative Judaism today," states the RA's website.

Conservative Judaism "insists on observance of tradition and respect for visionary change. [It] places its trust in its rabbis to be interpreters of Halachah and guides to Jewish life and learning. Each rabbi serves as halachic authority for his or her community, and our rabbis collectively give direction through the Rabbinical Assembly," the organization says.

The group encompasses both the Conservative movement in North America and its affiliated Masorti movement overseas.

Among Rabbi Scheim's priorities is to strengthen Conservative Judaism in Israel. He said the RA "is heavily involved" in Israeli policy on access to religious sites.

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Earlier this month, reports in Israel said leaders of the Reform and Conservative movements in North America are organizing a trip to tell Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in person of their strong opposition to any changes in the plan to build a new egalitarian prayer space at the Western Wall.

A 2013 poll found 3.2 per cent of Israeli Jews self-identified as Conservative. Rabbi Scheim said there are about 75 Conservative congregations in the country, a seminary and some 200 rabbis.

Apart from the "major goal to strengthen ourselves as an international movement," another priority is strategic planning.

"We're really looking to increase our level of service to our members, and by extension, to our communities. Many [RA members] do not head synagogues, but do chaplaincy, academic and on-campus work," Rabbi Scheim said.

In the early 1990s, some Conservative rabbis bolted the RA and formed the Union for Traditional Judaism, a more right-leaning group. Rabbi Scheim said the hot-button issues that threatened to split the Conservative rabbinate have been settled. Among them was the role of women.

"We've moved past some of the really difficult issues of the last few decades," Rabbi Scheim said. "The movement is, by and large, egalitarian at this point, save for a few places in Canada [and] in Toronto that are not completely egalitarian. They have the right not to be, and I respect for them for that. We don't legislate. We are pluralistic. We represent and respect different approaches.

"The truth is, there are no major schisms at this point. I don't see a major split."

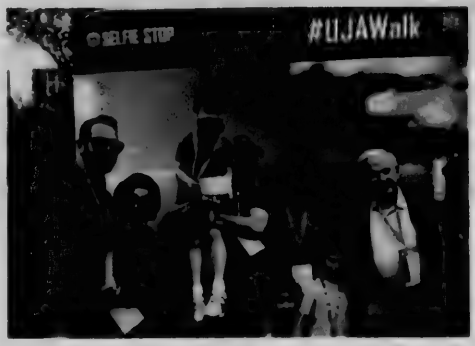
He said nearly all Conservative synagogues in the United States are fully egalitarian.

Rabbi Scheim conceded that his thinking on the subject took a long time to evolve. His own congregation is fully egalitarian, "which I would not have envisioned 25 years ago.

"Over a very gradual process in my own development, I've come to see that the argument used to deny women access to ritual was much weaker than the incentive to involve them and empower them. The results have proven that was the correct course, but it took me a long time to evolve. I pride myself on the fact that I'm willing to change a position on a certain key issue." ■

Man, 90, never misses a chance to Walk with Israel

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Samuel Hershenhorn, pictured with his family, has taken part in the annual event for the past 45 years.

For the past 46 years, since the inception of Toronto's annual Walk with Israel, Samuel Hershenhorn has joined thousands of people of all ages to raise funds for the Jewish state.

Hershenhorn, who turned 90 on Feb. 25, plans to walk again in the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's event this year, on May 29.

"The annual fundraiser has become a family matter for me. My children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren will walk with me to support this worthy cause."

He says that last year he raised $45,000, "and this year I hope to raise $60,000. Over the past 45 years, I have raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Israel."

Hershenhorn has visited Israel 11 times and has also participated in fundraising walks in Israel.

He attributes his ability to participate to the fact that "I have been a relentless walker and I made good choices in my health care. I have a wonderful partner, Gert, who helped me explore my strengths."

Born in Tarnow, Poland, he left with his mother, two brothers and a sister in 1935 to join his father, who escaped the anti-Semitism there a few years earlier. His father had established a career as a tailor in Toronto.

When Hershenhorn was nine years old, he attended Orde Street Public School near the Kensington Market area where many Yiddish-speaking families settled in the 1930s. He was recently a member of the planning committee for an event celebrating the school's 100th anniversary.

After school, he sold newspapers and recalls that he would pay two cents wholesale for a paper and many people would give him a nickel and tell him to keep the change.

He went on to Harbord Collegiate, and after graduation, entered Central Technical School where he graduated as a draftsman.

In 1943, Hershenhorn joined the Air Force and became a radio operator. When he left the services, he joined his family in the women's fashion business. After almost 50 years, he retired from full-time work in 1994, and went to work at Tom's Place, where he continues to work at their large sales.

As a frequent visitor to Israel, he notes that this year's Toronto walk will be supporting projects in Sderot, Bat Yam and Eilat.

"I am looking forward to walking with thousands of Jewish people of all ages waving Israeli flags, and delighted that I am able to help my brethren in Israel. I am truly blessed and grateful to so many people who sponsor me every year, from small donations to thousands of dollars."

A true salesman in every way with a joie de vivre, Hershenhorn notes that he has established an online donation page inviting members of the community to donate to Team Hershenhorn.

He personally contacts each person who has supported him in the past. He adds that tax receipts will be issued by UJA for all donations. "And I will even pick up your donation." ■

Museum proposes to recall Jews of Radom

Curator Allan Fryman stands in front of artifacts to be included in the museum.
PAUL LUNGEN PHOTO

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Allan Fryman is of an age when he starts worrying about future generations and whether they will appreciate the people who came before.

A member of Beth Radom Congregation's board of governors, Fryman, 68, has a plan to address that. He is hoping to create a small museum in the shul's lower lobby to recall not only the synagogue's storied history, but also the history of the Jews of Radom and their contributions to Jewish life.

Fryman, who serves as curator of the New Beth Radom Historical Society, has obtained an artist's conception of what the museum would look like. He envisions retaining a current glass-walled showcase featuring various artifacts and memorabilia related to the synagogue, but adding a wall-sized mural with a map of Radom, Poland, along with diagrams of immigration patterns and information about the city's Jewish population.

On the opposite wall, near the staircase, would be a big screen TV with a looping video presentation of Radom, along with more artifacts he is soliciting from Radom families, such as ledgers, photos, paperwork, letters, flyers and even landing papers.

"It would be like a time capsule with educational opportunities for the younger generation," Fryman said.

The Beth Radom synagogue was founded by emigres from that Polish city who departed the old country well before the Holocaust, he said.

Prior to the Holocaust, Radom, located near the larger city of Lodz, was home to an estimated 25,000 Jews. Some were fortunate to leave prior to onset of the war, but those who remained were killed either in the ghetto established in the town or in the death camp at Treblinka.

Currently the spiritual home for about 350 families, the synagogue got its start on Beverley Street in the mid-1920s. Fryman's immigrant grandfather, Isadore Green, was one of the founders.

Holocaust survivors who came to Toronto to set up their own shul, but later merged with the established Beth Radom Congregation.

Like other immigrants, Green went to work at a young age as a silversmith/metalworker.

At the time, Radomers created various societies to survive their community, among them the Radomer Friendly Society, the Radomer Mutual Benefit Society, the Radomer Aid Society and other Radom organizations, Fryman said.

Besides establishing communities in Toronto and Montreal, Radomers immigrated to the United States, Brazil, Australia and Israel.

Fryman's uncle, he pointed out, was on board the famed ship, Exodus, and ended up helping found a synagogue in Israel called B'nai Radom.

His uncle returned to Radom to find the community destroyed and even the cemeteries desecrated. The Nazis had taken the headstones and used them to pave aerodrome runways and roads. Thanks to an intervention with the Polish government, the headstones were retrieved and placed in a memorial in Radom to honour those who died, Fryman said.

Fryman has been in touch with Radomers around the world through social media sites and he hopes they will support the project, either financially or through the donation of memorabilia.

He estimates it will cost around $30,000 for the museum once completed, but "$10,000 would get me started."

Fryman believes only a handful of people know the history of the community and he would like to pass on the stories to new generations of people.

"The idea is for the younger generation to appreciate the older generation, keep their heritage and not stray too far," he said. ■

Anti-BDS bill defeated in vote at Queen's Park

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A private member's bill that targeted the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel was defeated by a decisive 39-18 vote yesterday afternoon at Queen's Park.

Drafted by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies president and CEO Avi Benlolo, Liberal MPP Mike Colle and Conservative MPP Tim Hudak, "Standing Up Against Anti-Semitism in Ontario Act" identified the BDS movement as "one of the main vehicles for spreading anti-Semitism and the delegitimization of Israel globally and is increasingly promoted on university campuses in Ontario... leading to intimidation and violence on campuses."

Tories MPPs voted for the bill, while NDP MPPs voted against it, and Colle was its lone Liberal supporter.

When asked before the vote about the chances of the bill passing, Colle said, "I don't know. We'll see. I know the NDP are not supporting it, but we'll see what happens."

Thornhill MPP Gila Martow said she wasn't shocked the bill was defeated, but she was surprised the Liberals whipped the vote.

"It came from the higher-ups, ordering them to vote against it. They piled in. Almost everyone who wasn't on the Israel trip [with Premier Kathleen Wynne] was [in the legislature], which is very unusual for a Thursday afternoon... before a long weekend," Martow said.

"They weren't allowed to vote with their conscience, they were instructed. So while Kathleen Wynne is in Israel, her caucus is being instructed," she said, adding that when she looked at Colle, "he was fighting back tears."

"What a strong person to stand there while your entire caucus isn't supporting you."

Earlier this week in Israel, Wynne came out against BDS, but said Ontario must protect free speech. "The BDS position is certainly not mine, nor is it that of our government, and I entirely oppose the movement. In fact, I stand firmly against any position that promotes or encourages anti-Semitism in any way."

After the vote, Benlolo said in a statement he was "speechless by what he witnessed."

He said the Liberals showed up in large numbers to vote against the bill to send a strong message. "They could have given it a respectable defeat, let's say 21 to 18, but they wanted it to be decisive, and that's what's disconcerting about it," he told The CJN.

Although many of those who voted against the bill cited free speech, Benlolo said the bill intended to use the strategy of BDS supporters against them.

Liberal MPP Mike Colle

It called on the government to abstain from doing business with companies that support the BDS movement against Israel.

The act said provincial pension funds should divest themselves of investments in businesses that boycott Israel, and it also urged that colleges and universities be banned from supporting or participating in the BDS movement.

"It is a bill that is purely economic... It has nothing to do with free speech... It's really just about who you want to do business with. Do you want to do business with people who are anti-peace, or do you want to do business with people who are pro-Israel and allies of Israel?" Benlolo said.

Efforts to reach Colle after the vote were unsuccessful, but speaking to The CJN beforehand, he said he helped draft the bill to support his constituents.

"I represent a constituency at Eglinton-Lawrence, which has the second-highest number of people of Jewish heritage in Ontario... and one of the largest Holocaust survivor communities... I'm very sensitive to anything that smacks of anti-Semitism and this whole so-called BDS movement is really a very insidious attack on Jewish people and the State of Israel," Colle said.

In a statement after the vote, Hudak said it's "discouraging for the many Ontarians who have felt threatened and discriminated against, whether it be on campuses or in doing business in this province, to accept that Ontario isn't willing to stand up for them... Sadly, too many legislators do not yet understand the growing threat and the underlying intolerance and hatred that is the true face of the BDS movement."

Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East president Thomas Woodley said the bill "smears an entire movement of human rights activists by accusing them of anti-Semitism," and "is offensive in the way it attacks freedom of expression in Ontario, and the disinformation it creates about the BDS movement overall."

NDP MPP Cheri DiNovo declined to comment. Attempts to reach other NDP MPPs were unsuccessful. ■

Court finds no copyright infringement in Holocaust book

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Federal Court of Canada has ruled that a Holocaust book inspired by a documentary film and that relied heavily on facts revealed in the film did not infringe the filmmakers' copyright.

In a decision released May 10, Justice Keith Boswell ruled there is no copyright in the facts concerning the efforts by Polish-Catholic Franciszka Halamajowa to save three families of Jews from the Nazis. He rejected the filmmakers' assertion that the "small facts" contained in the documentary, which would not otherwise have been known, were plagiarized.

"Mrs. Halamajowa's story is not in and of itself covered by the applicants' [filmmakers'] copyright in the documentary," Boswell stated. "The factual details of her story are also not covered by the applicant's copyright. It is not the story that the applicants' copyright protects but, rather, the applicants' specific expression of it through the exercise of their skill and judgment."

"On a qualitative and holistic view, the book is not a mere imitation of or substantial taking from the documentary," Boswell ruled.

Boswell's decision dismissed a claim by filmmakers Judy Maltz, Barbara Bird and Richie Sherman, who produced and directed the 2009 film No. 4 Street of Our Lady. They had alleged that author Jennifer Witterick and her publisher, Penguin Books Canada, had infringed their copyright when they published the book My Mother's Secret in 2013.

The filmmakers alleged that the book copied the story they had told, which was based in large part on the diary of Moshe Maltz, Judy Maltz's grandfather. Moshe Maltz, along with other family members and a German deserter, had been hidden from the Nazis by Franciszka Halamajowa and her daughter, Helena in the town of Sokal, Poland.

"Ms. Maltz alleges that the book copies personal family stories as well as the structure and narrative devices of the documentary," Judge Boswell noted.

But Boswell stated that it is the expression of the story that can be subject to copyright, not the facts that underline the story.

"The material that is properly the subject of the applicants' copyright is their expression of Mrs. Halamajowa's story, not the story itself. It is difficult to see how [Maltz's] copyright has in fact been infringed at all by the book."

Jennifer Witterick speaks to teenagers in Scarborough about her book.

Witterick, a financial consultant, told The CJN her intentions in telling Halamajowa's story were always honourable.

"I believed right from the beginning that I'd done nothing wrong. I love underdog stories" – how people of various backgrounds can "perform feats of courage," she said.

"This story touched me in such a strong way, I felt compelled to share it," she added.

Only days after the judgment was released, Witterick presented her interpretation of the story to a "mixed community" of teenagers at a school in Scarborough.

"I was amazed at how enthusiastic and how warm the welcome was that I received from the kids," she said. "I think the message of courage and kindness is universal. No matter what is your background, you can identify with this [story]."

Witterick said the book has proven a resounding success. It has been printed in nine languages and has been distributed in Germany, Israel, Poland, Japan, Thailand and her native Taiwan.

She believes she has succeeded in telling a Holocaust story in an inspirational way and made it accessible to young readers.

"My intention in writing the book was always to spread goodwill... to share a story of courage, kindness and love, and encourage young people to see that's something to aspire to and share the story of what happened in the Holocaust," Witterick said.

Asked to comment on the case, Maltz replied, "We are studying the ruling." ■

Billionaire gives $30 million to U of Manitoba med school

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Dr. Maxwell Rady was one of the most prominent Jewish doctors of his era to practice in Manitoba, and now, thanks to a major donation by his son and daughter-in-law, Ernest and Evelyn Rady, his name is being officially linked with the University of Manitoba's faculty of medicine.

In honour of Ernest and Evelyn Rady's $30-million gift, the largest in the university's 139-year history, U of M's faculty of health sciences – which includes the colleges of dentistry, medicine, nursing, pharmacy and rehabilitation sciences – will now be known as the Rady Faculty of Health Sciences, and doctors will now graduate from the Max Rady College of Medicine.

In an emotional speech at the graduation ceremony for 106 new doctors on May 12, the 78-year-old San Diego-based billionaire philanthropist said: "In [the] spirit of wanting to make a difference – a big difference – I decided to make a gift to my alma mater, and specifically to the faculty of health sciences in honour of Max and Rose Rady. They taught me the values of hard work and giving back.

"The college of medicine is where my father got his start and allowed him to make a difference in the lives of so many people here in Manitoba, and the college is of particular significance to myself and my sisters."

Dr. Brian Postl, dean of the Rady Faculty of Health Sciences, called the donation transformative. "This gift raises the stature of the Rady Faculty of Health Sciences and will bolster teaching, learning, inter-professional collaboration and research in the health sciences for generations."

Maxwell Rady, born Avraham Radishkevic, immigrated to Manitoba from Russia in 1893, and changed his name when he arrived in Canada. He worked as the secretary at Talmud Torah School and put himself through medical school at U of M. He was one of the first Jewish doctors given admitting privileges at St. Boniface Hospital, which was founded by the Grey Nuns.

He married his wife, the former Rose Bronfman, in 1922. A dedicated volunteer, Rose Rady was the first Jewish woman in Winnipeg to participate actively at the highest leadership levels in non-Jewish causes.

Max and Rose Rady had three children,

Ernest and his two older sisters, Marjorie Blankstein (a longtime community leader in her own right) and Mindel Olenick, both of whom still live in Winnipeg. All three are U of M graduates, as is Evelyn Rady.

Rose and Max Rady also have their name attached to the city's Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre in recognition of the substantial donation made by their children toward the construction of the Asper Jewish Community Campus, which opened in 1997.

Ernest Rady holds commerce and law degrees from U of M. He lives in San Diego, where he founded American Assets financial services and is a former part-owner of Major League Baseball's San Diego Padres. In 2006, the Rady family gave a $60-million donation to the Children's Hospital of San Diego, the largest children's hospital in California, which was subsequently renamed Rady Children's Hospital-San Diego.

Rady and his sisters previously gave U of M's college of medicine $900,000 to establish the Mindermar Professorship in Human Simulation in 2009.

The $30-million donation will be placed in an endowment fund within the university's ongoing $500-million Front and Centre capital campaign and will generate about $1.6 million each year for student financial aid, research, and equipment and capital upgrades. ■

Is Israel advocacy crowding out other social concerns?

Benjamin Shinewald, former CEO of the defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, says the Jewish community is turning inward, with the notable exception of the widespread response to sponsoring Syrian refugees.

He places some of the blame on previous governments that politicized issues such as climate change, which he says should not be seen as either right- or left-wing issues. But much of the problem lies in the Jewish community's focus on Israel advocacy to the exclusion of other causes, he argues.

"Israel advocacy has never taken up so much space in the community agenda as it does now," crowding out other concerns such as poverty and fighting for human rights, he says.

Ultimately, the over-emphasis on Israel advocacy is alienating a generation of young people, he adds.

"Israel advocacy has a super-important place in our community, but how we go about it and how we harness resources for competing obligations as Jews is a discussion this community needs to have."

Earlier this year, Shinewald, and 40 other "authors, artists, human rights advocates, scholars, rabbis [and] Jewish communal professionals," signed an article in The CJN calling for just such a debate.

Social action and advocacy are, for many, a key part of Jewish identity. JODIE SHUPAC PHOTO

The response has been disappointing. "It was surprising to many in the community this did not spark a discussion," Shinewald says.

Shimon Fogel, who heads the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the community's pre-eminent voice on social and political issues, says the Jewish community is represented by CIJA on a wide range of initiatives.

CIJA is a "lead member of coalitions" dealing with genetic discrimination, physician-assisted death, immigration and refugee policy and aboriginal issues, among other concerns, he wrote in an email.

"We reject zero-sum propositions. Within our constituency, there are those who have a special interest in Israel-related issues, while others are driven by a concern for social policy issues. One basket of priorities is not pursued at the expense of the other."

On issues that have no "unique or specific Jewish dimension," such as the environment, "there is a sense that in light of the many general organizations devoted to those issues, Jews can engage directly without a Jewish-specific conduit. But that does not make the issue any less important to the Jewish community," he wrote. In those cases, CIJA will often comment or join a coalition, but not as a "stand-alone initiative."

But there are those who argue that not only is it vital for Jewish institutions to be deeply involved in a wide variety of issues, it's also crucial for the future of the Judaism.

The success of the Jewish community will be determined, "by how well we can integrate our traditions with the moral callings of our time, how well can we integrate our Jewish particularness with our universalism," says Rabbi Yanklowitz.

"This is not only to suggest whether we can survive as a Diaspora people, but whether we're going to have truly something of value to add to the world during this critical period." ■

Wynne speaks out against BDS during Israel trip

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne visited Yad Vashem and the Kotel during weeklong trip to Israel and the West Bank. ONTARIO MINISTRY PHOTOS

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne capped off her week-long business mission to Israel and the West Bank on May 20, which began with a visit to Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

Wynne's mission, which comprised more than 150 people, was massive in both size and scope, and included more than 40 stops over the course of five days. According to the premier's office, it generated more than $87 million worth of business deals for Ontario in areas such as high-tech, education and medicine.

At an event in Tel Aviv early in the week, Wynne spoke out to reiterate her position on boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel.

"I entirely oppose the BDS movement. In fact, any position that promotes or encourages anti-Semitism in any way – we have to stand against that," she announced to enthusiastic applause.

However, back in Ontario, a private members' bill against BDS was defeated 39-18 at Queen's Park on May 19. Tory MPP Tim Hudak and Liberal MPP Mike Colle introduced the bill, with Hudak stating that the aims of BDS are "to sponsor the delegitimization of the state of Israel as well as to foster hatred and animosity against those of Jewish faith in support of Israel." The bill would have barred the province from doing business with companies supporting BDS.

Wynne said that while she supports free speech, "it's unacceptable for students, or parents, or children to feel unsafe or discriminated against. So I oppose movements that are attempting to divide our society and are attempting to promote anti-Semitism, homophobia, anti-Islamism, all of those -isms that create fear and hate in our communities."

During her visit, Wynne enjoyed unprecedented access, with highlights including extended personal meetings with both Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. She has previously led business missions to China, India and the United States, drumming up business for Ontario and promoting the province as a world leader in trade, on par with many smaller countries.

Wynne was accompanied on the trip by high-profile MPPs, including Minister of Innovation and Minister of Training, Colleges and Universities Reza Moridi and Minister of Health Eric Hoskins, as well as more than 130 representatives from Ontario's business, financial and educational sectors.

Moridi said, "We are here today, working as one team – a dream team, driving Ontario's future success."

Canadian Ambassador Vivian Bercovici said during the visit that Israelis "already know how fabulous Canadians are. We don't need to sell them on that... now we're going to get out there and tell everybody what a great place Ontario is to do business."

While many of the deals cemented during the trip took place between businesses, including dozens of new business agreements and partnerships in the science and technology and information and communications technology (ICT) sectors, and did not directly involve government, Wynne said she sees official representatives playing a facilitating role, noting, "It helps to have the government opening doors and allowing those connections to happen."

Other significant deals over the course of the week included a $50 million five-year deal between Ontario's Centre for Commercialization of Regenerative Medicine and six Israeli universities and research institutions, which will generate an estimated 150 new jobs in Ontario.

New and extended partnerships were also announced between medical institutions, including Toronto's Baycrest Health Sciences and University Health Network, along with numerous colleges and universities in Ontario and Israel, such as the University of Toronto, York University, McMaster University and OCAD University that will ensure two-way exchanges of students and innovation for years to come.

"Ontario is a place that is hungry to maintain its position... in terms of economic growth and being the economic engine that we are. We are in a very strong position... we need to keep that, and we can't be complacent. We need to be very intentional," Wynne said.

As well as stopping in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa, Wynne's mission spent time in the West Bank, in Ramallah and Bethlehem, meeting with Abbas and signing deals with businesses, health-care institutions and universities there.

While in the West Bank, Wynne attended a scholarship ceremony for the Daughters for Life Foundation, which will provide opportunities for 21 young women to pursue post-secondary education at Palestinian universities and colleges. She attended a parallel ceremony in Jerusalem giving scholarships to 28 Israeli Arab and Jewish students to study in Israel.

The Daughters for Life Foundation was established in 2011 by Palestinian-Canadian doctor Izzeldin Abuelaish after the killing of three of his daughters by Israeli tank fire in the Gaza War of 2008/2009. Additional scholarship opportunities were announced that will bring West Bank students to study in Ontario.

Wynne also made stops at both the Western Wall and Yad Vashem, where she laid a wreath and noted in the guest book that, "It is only through love, tolerance and mutual respect that we can shine a light to keep the darkness at bay." ■

Israel trip means big business, premier tells CJN

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne believes the outcomes of the busy week of meetings she has led between government officials and sectors including business, technology and health will convince naysayers about her mission to Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) this week.

"I couldn't disagree more with the notion that it's not worth making a trip like this," she said in an interview with The CJN.

Over the week, Wynne said, "we have signed agreements and memoranda of understanding worth about $182 million, [creating] 216 jobs. More than that, I would say that there is huge potential for us to do more together, whether it's in educational exchanges, whether it's research and development innovation.

"There were 44 deals that were signed... but the impact will go way beyond that."

Israel is a great connection for Ontario because there are so many cultural similarities, she believes. "We are both knowledge economies and we know that both jurisdictions see our people as our most important asset and resource. So if we're going to be able to compete globally, we have to make sure that our people are at their best.

"I know that our business delegates have been very, very happy with the connections that they've made and have said that it was very much worth being here."

Deals have been inked between universities, business partnerships and organizations like IBM Canada and its Israeli counterpart, with TEVA Pharmaceutical Industries, which already has a presence in Ontario about possibilities for expansion, and Mississauga's Inflamax Research and Israel's AdOm Tech in the medical technology field.

While in Israel, Wynne said, she's seen "investment in people and their skills and abilities... which is exactly what we're trying to do," and she's developed a better understanding of the term "start-up nation," crediting Israel's success, in part, to the fact that the Office of the Chief Scientist, which signed deals with several Ontario entities, is autonomous and not part of the government.

Before her political career, Wynne had a close relationship with the Jewish community, at one point working as an educator helping train students and staff in conflict resolution at schools such as Toronto's United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy). She says Jewish schools were particularly open to her message.

"There was a real receptivity to that work in the Hebrew day schools exactly because there's the derech eretz portion of the curriculum... 'We have to figure out how to get along with each other, we have to figure out how to resolve problems and talk things out.'"

Addressing last week's failed private member's bill in the Ontario legislature to bar the province from deals with companies supporting boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS), Wynne reiterated her support of the Jewish community and her government's strong conviction that "any movement like the BDS movement that is based on anti-Semitism, that is based in division and promotes hatred, is just unacceptable."

She has been gratified at how warmly her delegation has been received throughout the trip, receiving an almost-unprecedented level of access for a regional, not national leader, including extended meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and PA President Mahmoud Abbas. "I hadn't necessarily expected that, overall, people would be as happy that we're here."

Asked if this reception was connected to the unequivocal support offered by former prime minister Stephen Harper during his 2014 visit, making Canada the darling of the Israeli media at the time, Wynne said positive relationships between the two nations go back many years. "We're part of that goodwill that has been in place for many decades.

"Prime minister Harper built on it in a particular way, but what I have said to all of the folks in political meetings I'm in is that I believe that Prime Minister (Justin) Trudeau is going to be able to do the same thing... to build on those decades of friendship."

Overall, Wynne said, "It's been an amazing trip...I am leaving with the sense that this is such a beautiful, complex place. I knew it... but now I have a visceral sense of that."■

Ya'alon steps down due to 'lack of trust' in Netanyahu

JTA
JERUSALEM

Following reports of his imminent replacement, Moshe Ya'alon resigned as Israel's defence minister citing distrust in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

His resignation – he is rumoured to be replaced with former foreign minister Avigdor Liberman (see analysis on next page) – came in a statement on May 20, when this edition went to press.

Ya'alon said it was due to Netanyahu's "conduct during recent developments and in light of lack of trust in him." He also said he was leaving politics.

Earlier last week, officials from Netanyahu's Likud party confirmed that talks were ongoing to have Ya'alon, a Likud member and former chief of staff, replaced with Liberman, leader of the right-wing Yisrael Beiteinu party. The talks involved bringing Yisrael Beiteinu into the coalition, a move which would have broadened the coalition's number of seats in the 120-seat Knesset from 61 to 67.

In a statement May 20, Netanyahu said: "I regret Bogie Ya'alon's decision," using Ya'alon's nickname. "I think he should have remained a full partner in the country's leadership."

Netanyahu said Ya'alon was not asked to drop the position due to any "crisis in trust" but as part of a political deal designed "to being stability to Israel as it faces major challenges." He added he offered Ya'alon to become foreign minister, but that Ya'alon decided to resign instead.

Ya'alon's resignation follows discord between him and Netanyahu over policy issues, most recently on whether Israel Defence Forces officers should be permitted to express their personal opinions publicly. Netanyahu harshly condemned Deputy Chief of Staff Yair Golan's drawing of parallels between Nazi Germany and Israeli society during a Holocaust commemoration ceremony earlier this month.

"If there's something that frightens me about the memory of the Holocaust is the recognition of revolting processes that happened in Europe in general and in Germany in particular back then, 70, 80 and 90 years ago, and finding proof of their presence here, in our midst, in 2016," Golan said.

Ya'alon subsequently called on IDF officers to "continue to speak their mind."

Yuval Diskin, a former head of the Israel Security Agency, or Shin Bet, wrote an op-ed that was published in Yediot Acharonot May 20 saying that Liberman's appointment may be the "beginning of the end" of the State of Israel because it would encourage Jewish fundamentalists and place the defence establishment under the control of "an insecure prime minister and an inexperienced defence minister." He said he would not trust them to use the army responsibly.

Diskin also revealed that Ya'alon disobeyed direct orders while serving as the head of the IDF Israeli Central Command in 1998, when Netanyahu was prime minister. Shin Bet was ordered to storm a building with two Hamas terrorists near Hebron. The IDF was ordered to keep away from the area to avoid escalation but Ya'alon sent troops anyway because he disagreed with the order, Diskin revealed.

Ya'alon and another senior officer told Diskin that "despite the decision of the defence minister and the chief of staff, they were sending the troops we required as backup. I was proud of their courage to take such a decision," Diskin wrote.

With Ya'alon walking away from his seat in the Knesset representing Likud, stepping in to replace him will be Yehuda Glick, a U.S. native who leads a group that advocates for wider Jewish access to the Temple Mount.

In October 2014 he was seriously wounded in an attempted assassination at the Menachem Begin Center in Jerusalem by a Palestinian gunman. As a guide, he also leads groups of Jewish tours to the Temple Mount to earn his livelihood. ■

ANALYSIS

Netanyahu embraces a politician who despises him

David Horovitz
JERUSALEM

The job of Israeli defence minister – in a country all too often drawn into conflict, in a country that requires its young men and women to serve in its army – holds immense significance and sensitivity. The burden of defending this country is complex and ever-shifting. The dilemmas – practical and moral – over how best to protect Israel are acute. The defence minister, helming a hierarchy potentially sending young Israelis to their deaths, carries an extraordinary degree of responsibility, second only to that of the prime minister.

Last Wednesday, May 18, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu entrusted that position, that burden, that responsibility, to Avigdor Liberman, a politician who has relished staking out non-sensitive positions. A politician who shoots from the lip.

A politician who, just weeks ago, chose to show solidarity with a soldier charged with manslaughter in the death of a disarmed Palestinian assailant – even as the army's leading generals were seeking to emphasize the imperative for soldiers to maintain Israel's guiding moral standards.

A politician who has called for the ouster of Mahmoud Abbas, even as Netanyahu has been trying to assure the international community of his desire to enter negotiations with the Palestinian Authority president.

A politician who, even as the last war against Hamas was at its height in the summer of 2014, and even as he sat in the intimate cabinet forum stewarding the Israeli military response, publicly castigated Netanyahu and his own government for its ostensibly inept conduct. Who after the war ridiculed the prime minister under whom he had served as paranoid and ineffectual. Who derided Netanyahu in an interview with this writer last year as being incapable of facing down Hamas, incapable of tackling the threat posed by Iran, incapable of defending the country.

A first question that must be asked, therefore, is: Why? Why is Netanyahu choosing to bring, to this most crucial and sensitive of positions, a man who plainly has no respect for him, cannot be trusted to support him in public, will alienate a not-insignificant proportion of international supporters of Israel, will exacerbate tensions in parts of the Arab world, and who will render at least some Israeli parents considerably more wary when the day comes for their children to be enlisted?

Avigdor Liberman leads a press conference in the Israeli parliament on May 18.

> This revived partnership would appear to be a recipe for renewed disappointment and grief.

Why do so when the former defence minister Moshe Ya'alon, who announced his resignation on May 20, sees the complexities of the Palestinian conflict much as Netanyahu does, has shown no hesitation in confronting the international community when he believes it is misjudging Israel's challenges, is respected by the IDF's top command, stood side-by-side with Netanyahu to grapple with numerous rounds of conflict and surges in terrorism, and shares Netanyahu's demonstrable reluctance to get embroiled in lengthy military misadventures?

There are plenty of answers. But it is hard to see them as sufficient. For those who dislike Liberman and regard him as dangerous, of course, no answer would be sufficient. But even for Netanyahu, the calculation seems flawed.

First and foremost in Netanyahu's thinking is the fact that he holds a 61-strong coalition in the 120-seat Knesset, and that's a lousy way to have to govern. Whether or not he really would have preferred Isaac Herzog's dysfunctional party to join him, the fact is that the Zionist Union leader has little support from his own MKs, was driving a hard bargain, and is reviled by Netanyahu's right-wing constituency. Liberman, by contrast – in one of the reversals that are his hallmark – suddenly pronounced himself ready and available, to the delight of much of the rest of the current coalition.

Netanyahu thus widens his government, keeps his right flank happy, and humiliates Herzog.

And if he had come to regard Ya'alon as a potential political threat, as overly emphatic in his championing of the military ethos, as an irritating stickler, then sidelining the current defence minister constitutes an added bonus.

But that brings us to a second question: how is this bombshell appointment likely to pan out?

Domestically, in the short term, Netanyahu could conceivably feel rather pleased with himself. He may be spared the humiliation of legislative defeats, and may have rendered himself less vulnerable to political extortion from within that narrowest of coalitions. He has plunged the main opposition party into a frenzy of bitter recrimination and public ridicule. He may relish having the tough-talking Liberman at his side. He may try to persuade the international community that he had no room to manoeuvre and portray himself as the relatively moderate, responsible figure who can still be relied upon to prevent any overly radical lurches to the right, be it on settlements, the use of force, controversial legislation and more.

But it is also easy to envisage that the Obama administration, with whom Netanyahu has had such a difficult relationship, will take an extremely dim view of this unexpected new coalition constellation, and may henceforth prove more inclined to help the French along with their international peace conference idea, or more flexible on the matter of Palestinian-prompted efforts at the UN Security Council.

It is hard to believe that Egypt's President Abdel-Fattah Sissi, who just recently was hailing potential peace opportunities and may have believed he would soon be dealing with Foreign Minister Herzog, will be joyfully contemplating the arrival of Liberman. Much the same could be said of the Saudis, who just days ago, remarkably, sent Prince Turki bin Faisal Saud to share a public forum in Washington, D.C., with Netanyahu's ex-national security adviser Yaakov Amidror.

And even if one subscribes to the notion that all of Netanyahu's key calculations ultimately reduce to a desire to maintain his own prime ministership, this revived partnership would appear to be a recipe for renewed disappointment and grief. For if Netanyahu was irritated by Ya'alon's unstated prime ministerial aspirations, Liberman emphatically seeks the top spot. He attempted to plot that course by allying his Yisrael Beitenu with the Likud before the penultimate elections, and was stymied. Now, though his political weight was much reduced in last year's elections, he is being invited to take the job – defence minister – that he sees as an essential staging post on the route to the premiership.

Whatever grandiose professions of friendship, trust and co-operation are made in the next few days, therefore, there is no reason to believe that this latest iteration of the on-off Netanyahu-Liberman alliance, which began almost 30 years ago, will end any differently than its predecessors: in bitter separation.

The final question, though, is how much damage will be done in the interim. ■

Jewish Music Week features something for everyone

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Jewish Music Week artistic director Aliza Spiro promises that the sixth annual event in Toronto will have something for everyone.

Presenting free concerts by day and gala concerts by night, the programs include Sephardi and Klezmer music, Israeli pop, Broadway tunes, as well as jazz, big band, cantorial, folk, and gospel music.

The event, which is always scheduled to run after Lag b'Omer to accommodate observant Jews who cannot listen to music during the Omer, will run from May 29 to June 5.

Spiro said in an effort to cater to all age groups, there is a show for children, another that targets young professionals, and a third that caters to seniors.

The Cool Kids Concert, presented in partnership with Jewish Family & Child on June 5, features American entertainer Eric Komar who recently released a children's album.

For the first time this year, JMW is helping B'nai Brith reach out to young professionals with a concert by ARI, formerly known as Daniella Watters, on May 31 at EFS on King Street. She will be promoting her debut album Tunnel Vision.

"Young people tend to work, and they're not around during the day, so for the most part, they aren't able to attend our daytime events. This year, for the first time, we have a nighttime concert specifically geared to young professionals. It's downtown at EFS, which is about as hip and trendy as you can get. It's like the polar opposite of having a concert at a synagogue," Spiro said, adding that it's not to say that musical presentations at synagogues aren't a good thing, but with this event, they're trying to target an audience that wouldn't find themselves at a shul for a show.

Another event presented in partnership with Active 55+, a seniors group based at the Miles Nadal JCC, will honour Austrian-American Jewish actor, folk singer, musician and composer Theodore Bikel, who died last year. Mitch Smolkin and award-winning pianist Nina Shapilsky, will pay tribute to him on June 2.

Spiro said that many of the free daytime concerts, for which you have to register in advance, are at full capacity, and have waiting lists. She expects that JMW will attract between 6,000 and 10,000 people.

"There are a lot of Broadway lovers and every year, we do stuff for Jewish Broadway. Steven Lutvak, who won the Tony for the best musical last year for A Gentleman's Guide to Love and Murder – which is being presented by Mirvish until June 26 – will kick off the weeklong event on May 29 at Hugh's Room on Dundas Street.

The following evening, the Shirat Tikvah Jubilee Gala Concert at Beth Tikvah Synagogue will celebrate 50 years of music at Beth Tikvah and will feature the music of the late Srul Irving Glick, Helen Greenberg and Eyal Bitton.

On June 1, Beth Tzedec Cantor Simon Spiro will perform with the Toronto Festival Singers – formerly the Beth Tzedec Singers – at the Glenn Gould Studio.

The following night, four of this year's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's ShinShinim, young Israeli emissaries selected for a year of service in Toronto's Jewish community, will open the Israel Music Today show with covers of some of Israel's most popular songs, including tracks by Idan Raichel and Rita, Arik Berman and Keren Peles.

"The opening act of that night is by the Shinshinim. We took four of them who are unbelievably talented. They're just marvellous. They'll be opening for the Evan Malach performance. I love the fact that we're able to give a platform to these kids," Spiro said.

Another draw is the Canadian premiere of a documentary about Flory Jagoda, a 90-year-old Sephardi composer and performer, called Flory's Flame, which will be screened at Baycrest on May 30. ■

Danny Marks highlights Jewish blues musicians at music week lecture

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Musician, broadcaster and blues historian Danny Marks will be bringing his guitar along to a lecture he's giving about Jews and the blues, as part of Jewish Music Week. He'll be performing his Belt Line Blues, a coming-of-age song in which he reminisces about the railway line that bordered the backyard of his family's midtown Toronto home.

Marks, the host of the 2013-14 HiFi TV series Cities in Blue, which focuses on the history of the blues in eight U.S. cities, wrote Belt Line Blues for the Piedmont, Kan. episode.

"We saw Toronto's first subways arrive fresh off the boat, on flatbeds," he recalled, and, growing up, he remembers playing up and down the line with friends. Today, the trains that Marks saw pass twice a day are gone, as are the tracks, removed to create the Kay Gardner Beltline Park and Trail.

The hook of Belt Line Blues, an engaging country-blues tune, is the touching verse about Mark leaving home as barely a young man. Marks, who got his first guitar when he was 11, realized he needed to go out on his own to follow his dream of becoming a professional guitarist. In Belt Line Blues, he sings: "Well, I left home when I was 17/ Mama was a cryin'/ Baby boy please don't go/ I said I gotta go/ And my papa said, 'Hand me the keys.'"

Marks went on to join the Yorkville village-era pop/blues group Edward Bear and played on the band's 1970 hit single, You, Me and Mexico. He became a sideman for Canadian and international performers, and he paid his dues in the Toronto club scene, often playing at Grossman's Tavern, a blues incubator on Spadina Avenue. Hosting blues jam sessions eventually led to Mark's dual career as musician/broadcaster. Marks, who currently hosts JazzFM91's Saturday night blues show, bluz.fm, plans to return to the small screen.

A recipient of the Toronto Blues Society's Blues with a Feeling Award for lifetime achievement, Marks got his first taste for the blues watching Louis Armstrong perform on the Ed Sullivan Show.

"He considered his music to have a lot of blues and he recorded a lot of blues, a different kind of blues than some but still distinctly blues," Marks said.

Armstrong, who wasn't Jewish but was adopted by a Jewish family, is one of the artists Marks will discuss. One of the greats of African-American culture, Armstrong wore a Star of David until the day he died.

"A lot of the Jewish soul and spirit went into him as a young boy and shaped him," Marks said, adding that as a child Armstrong paid for his first trumpet by helping out in the family's rag business, "the real schmatte business."

Marks intends to pack a lot of information into his hour-long lecture. Harold Arlen; Benny Goodman; Leonard and Phil Chess; Michael Bloomfield; Leiber and Stoller; Phil Spector; Morris Levy, the founder of Roulette Records, and Jerry Wexler, who coined the term "rhythm and blues," are among the producers, musicians and songwriters he'll be talking about.

You can pick up a copy of Marks' latest release, a critically acclaimed collection of songs he wrote for the TV series Cities in Blue, from him at his Jewish Music Week lecture or at the Cadillac Lounge on Queen Street West in Toronto, where he plays Saturday afternoons. For more information, visit www.dannym.com ■

Marks lectures on Jews and blues at 10 a.m. on May 30 at the Columbus Centre, 901 Lawrence Ave. W. The Jewish Music Week morning lecture series also includes talks on the portrayal of Jews in opera; on the creative process of a Jewish composer; on Jewish musical comedy, and on Ethel Stark, who overcame anti-Semitism and sexism to form the Montreal Women's Symphony Orchestra. All the lectures are free, but tickets are required for some. www.jewishmusicweek.com

ARI has new name and a new style

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

ARI, the singer formerly known as Daniella Watters, says her new persona signals a change in her sound and her musical direction as well as her desire to get away from writing pop standards.

ARI means lion in Hebrew, it's Nordic for eagle, and her personal name, Daniella, from the story of Daniel in the lion's den, completes the metaphor.

"I wanted to steer away from singing too much about love topics, to go to another level or emotion, and be very visceral and honest about other experiences," she said, speaking on the telephone from Los Angeles. She will be in Toronto later this month for Jewish Music Week.

In her six-track debut EP, Tunnel Vision, recorded in Toronto, ARI balances dark, melancholic elements, some from her own experience, with light, empowerment and strength.

"Without going through pain in my life, I wouldn't be able to channel it and turn it into art," she said.

Teachers, a recently released single and video from the EP, addresses the sexual double standards between men and women. "It's an empowerment song, calling out the differences in how men and women are treated and how boys and girls are brought up," ARI said. In their formative years, guys get the message, sometimes from their fathers, that it's alright to be promiscuous, she said. Meanwhile, fathers are telling girls, "Don't wear this, don't do that,'" she said, while encouraging the boys "to get those girls."

When they're dating, men are allowed, stigma free, to have many sexual partners, while if a "girl's numbers are too high, the guys are turned off," she said, adding a "lot of shaming goes onto women because men want to be the only key to the lock."

ARI stresses she's not advocating promiscuity in the video. Rather, "there shouldn't be such a heightened shaming, making people feel bad about who they are," she said. "We're all human, we're all sexual beings. Slut shaming and blaming women for being too provocative need to end."

Another recently released single and video from the EP, PLV (Pretty Little Villains), stands up for anyone who's been abused or taken advantage of.

"I had my own experiences being taken advantage of, just as many people, men and women, children and adults, have, and this song came out of that," she said.

ARI was motivated to write PLV after reading about a human-trafficking incident in Toronto, close to where she lived. She sings PLV while sitting in her bathtub, with thick (school) paint, symbolizing bad experiences, oozing down her face.

ARI (formerly known as Daniella Watters)

> Without going through pain in my life, I wouldn't be able to channel it and turn it into art.

"It's going to fall on your head, it's going to get all over you, but you can't let it be you," she said. "What happens to you isn't you. That's something that's just happened to you and you can wash it away."

In contrast to the serious tone of Teachers and PLV, Tiny Bubbles, a single from Tunnel Vision, to be released this month, is a lighthearted tune with somewhat comical, satirical lyrics that reflect on the drug culture. ARI's sound has gone through a transformation, from pop soul and R&B with jazz inflections, as Daniella, to minimalist indie pop with an electronic hip-hop cadence. ARI's vocal delivery is less soulful and more indie sounding than Daniella's, but "I think the soulful will always be a little bit there because it's just the nature of my voice," she said.

You can hear selections from the EP Tunnel Vision, to be released next month, at Maison Music!, a B'nai Brith Young Professionals event that's part of Jewish Music Week. ARI's band, keyboardist Dean Aivaliotis, drummer Jeremy Morgan and guitarist Robb Cappelletto, will play on top of a track to produce the electronic sound their instruments can't make. The music will sound very much like the EP, ARI said. To view Ari's videos, visit www.ari-music.net ■

ARI performs at Maison Music! at 8:15 p.m. (doors open at 7 p.m.) on May 31 at EFS, 647 King St. W. The music continues with the orchestral indie rock band, Common Deer, followed by a kosher midnight barbecue. For tickets, visit www.bnaibrith.ca/events. FUR-GIVE & FUR-GET:

A 'Paws'itive Approach Towards Alzheimer's Care

Like many of her generation and pedigree, she was born into a family of six to a young single mother unable to fully care for her. Her father, and the other fathers of those of her siblings who came before, didn't stay around long enough to raise her. She was at risk of ending up homeless and on the streets, begging passersby for scraps, looking through dumpsters, or worse yet – fighting for her very survival in a shelter.

Thankfully, she was adopted out at ten months old to a loving home. Now at 42, as a middle aged adult herself, she has settled into a regular routine. Each day the alarm goes off early in the morning. She wakes after sleeping like a dog, her comfy blanket lying rumpled on the bed. In the dark she groggily stumbles around in search of her favourite slippers and is eager to sink her teeth into the morning paper before heading to work. Running behind schedule, she gulps up breakfast and hurriedly and quite unladylike slurps down some water. Rushing out the door, she hops in the car for the ride to work.

It is a nice spring morning and she drives with the windows down feeling the fresh breeze through her golden hair. She is well known and popular in the neighbourhood and people smile and wave as the car passes by. She recognizes many familiar faces and she has even given kisses to many of them.

Arriving five minutes late, she bounds up the front walkway, stops just short of the main doors, crouches down and proceeds to relieve herself in the bushes....

It's another rewarding day in the life of Piper, a gentle-natured 6-year-old Golden Lab and certified St. John Ambulance Therapy Dog. Corroborated by scientific research, her weekly visits at the Alzheimer's Retirement Home result in residents displaying increased mood, engagement, eye contact, cognitive and verbal skills. Staff also equally benefit. Through Piper's visits, quality of life within the whole retirement community is improved.

Neil Simon play continues to resonate with audiences

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of theatre's most famous duos is back on stage at Soulpepper's Young Centre for the Performing Arts. Felix Ungar and Oscar Madison, the lead characters in Neil Simon's highly successful comedy The Odd Couple, have returned to embody the meaning of, "Honey, I love you, but..."

The familiar story is about best friends with diametrically opposite personalities who decide to share an apartment after each of their marriages has fallen apart. Felix is an obsessive neat freak who can't take time out from anxiety to enjoy life. Oscar relishes pleasure and is messy and careless par excellence.

This is the third time the show has graced Soulpepper's playbill. Apparently, out of approximately160 plays produced by Soulpepper, it is the sixth most popular production. The Odd Couple still delights audiences and makes them laugh. This is despite the social-political changes that have occurred over the last 50 years and the degree to which tastes have changed. Why?

Artistic director Albert Schultz who continues to perform in company productions despite his crammed schedule, places the answer at the feet of Simon. Schultz considers him, "A gifted writer who has penned some of the greatest comedies of the 20th century." Schultz claims that not only is Simon's ability to write a funny line unrivalled but also that he is a master of comedic structure. In The Odd Couple, Simon drops the audience into a play about marriage that isn't a marriage play. Schultz says.

"Everyone who comes to the show can relate to the situation because they've experienced the challenges, the frustrations and the hilarities of being in a relationship."

In this work, Felix represents "the feminine" part of the relationship painted in broad, over-the-top strokes. Oscar is the irresponsible "masculine" aspect of the couple. "The twist", says Schultz, "is that these roles are played by two heterosexual males."

Simon brings audience members to a familiar context, a relationship, but wacko clowns inhabit it. The joke is that these characters are an aspect of each of us. Who hasn't at some point been foolish or over-the-top ?

OK, so Simon is brilliant at creating a world that the audience will buy into, he deftly creates believable characters and funny lines pour out of his finger tips, but isn't the play ultimately froth, mere entertainment?

"Yes, this play is about coming to the theatre to be entertained," Schultz says. "There is a need and a place for theatre of that kind."

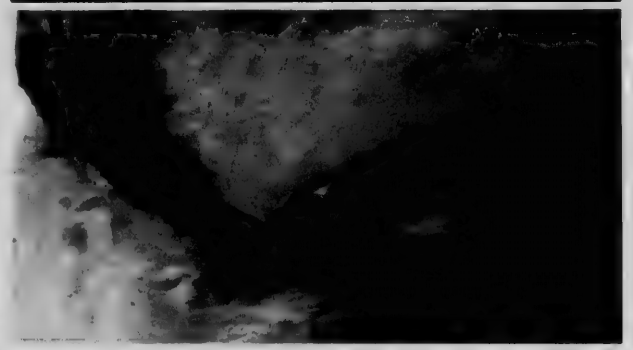
Schultz does not take the art of entertaining lightly. To understand why, perhaps one has to recall that "to entertain" has more than one meaning. One could say that a talented comedy writer is like a perceptive host who is able to make a guest who has spilled wine on the carpet feel comfortable.

His view is that Simon has been tarred by the brush of his own success. "There are those who say he can't be a good writer if he is that popular, but I say he is a great writer.

"The Odd Couple is about two people who are very different from one another but profoundly care about each other. They are people in deep crisis who have found each other and endeavour to find a way to maintain their friendship," he says. "This is what helps them move through their crisis."

In the current production, the fine cast – led by Schultz as Oscar and Diego Matamoros as Felix – use their talents to reveal the various aspects of the characters and the many dimensions of Simon's writing. When treated with respect, The Odd Couple is perennially funny and entertaining because it vividly shows the crazy ways people deal with sorrow. ■

The Odd Couple runs at the Young Centre for the Performing Arts in the Distillery District until June 11. www1.youngcentre.ca



Dark Bird

Heaven and Earth, an art exhibit by Romi Samuels and Sheila Carson, runs at Gallery1313 on Queen Street West in Toronto until June 5. Pictured is Dark Bird by Samuels from a series in which birds are an expressionist metaphor for freedom, fragility and power. Her large canvases, in dramatic black and white, with bold and energetic strokes embrace the struggle against the forces of nature.

West vs. East rivalry distracts from the big issues

Chaimie and Leizer

For those of us with a sweet spot for hip hop – for readers over 50, think bee-bop on repeat with totally bubbie-inappropriate material – we might well be familiar with East Coast and West Coast rivalry – names like Tupac Shakur and the Notorious BIG (not to be mixed up with the Notorious GIC, now a notoriously awful one per cent per annum) represent long-standing cross-continental conflict. Well, on some level, it's no different in the Jewish community. And while Minsk versus Pinsk might have been it years back, this time around for us Hosers, it's West Coast versus East Coast.

Religiously, there's something about the natural freedom of the West Coast and the allure of the Pacific that brings out the most spiritual practices of Judaism (and we're pretty sure it's not the salmon, as lox swims plentifully through every intestine on the East Coast, both upstream and downstream). There is something more natural, more loose, more traditionally disaffiliated yet more connected to divinity and the inner yogi in the West. Or in other words, if Safed found its way onto the continent, it would immediately place itself on a BC Ferry to Vancouver Island.

Statistically speaking (note: all of the following are from sources at least as reliable as Donald Trump's intel "team"), there is a 37 per cent greater chance on the West Coast that a religious ceremony will involve cannabis, and a 25 per cent chance that meat will not be involved. West Coasters will be 20 per cent less likely to be affiliated with a traditional synagogue. They will be 40 per cent more likely to be affiliated with a yoga studio. They are 140 per cent more likely to attend services in a yoga studio.

On the other hand, geographically, East Coast Jews tend to be connected more with the Old World, as they are literally closer to the seat of European history. Coming from Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal, you're about the same distance from Stonehenge as you are from stoned friends. This is not just convenient for European travel, should you have a craving to experience a little anti-Semitism in the flesh, but it also puts you more on the Israeli clock, which brings East Coast Jews somewhat closer to the Israeli zeitgeist. By this theory, Newfoundlanders would be slightly more Israeli, and while this seems highly counterintuitive, Newfie does sort of sound like a cute Israeli term for a Zionist pioneer (Bruchim habaim HaNewfim!)

On the other hand, the relative peace, quiet and slow pace of life of the West Coast is fundamentally anti-Israeli (and arguably anti-Semitic). And while you could say that Tel Aviv is a beach town with the sort of progressive ideas you might find on the West Coast, if you've experienced its humidity, it's much more of a packed subway ride in August than a stroll down Wreck Beach (not that there's anything wrong with that).

(Regardless of distance, it is important as Jews to practise the Shalosh Regalim by going to the United States three times a year for holy shopping pilgrimages and staying the mandatory period to claim our fully duty-free allowance. Whether it's Bellingham, Wash., or Plattsburgh, N.Y., we are not duty-free of this obligation.)

At the end of the day, we as Canadians, united by our Trans-Canada (brought to you by Tim Hortons), still deal with the same national problems, the same questions of whether Justin will be "good for the Jews" (Trudeau, but more importantly, Bieber), root for the Jays and Raptors (under different levels of duress), and feel that same love/hate relationship with Gary Bettman – is he good for the Jews, but bad for Canadian hockey?

The tachlis: in many cases these territorial rivalries are just media fabrications to distract you from the real issues: Fairmount versus St. Viateur bagels. (You can watch YidLife Crisis debate bagels on YouTube.) ■

Chaimie and Leizer are Jamie Elman and Eli Batalion, co-creators of the world's first online Yiddish sitcom YidLife Crisis.

Rabbi Soloveitchik's essays deal with timeless questions

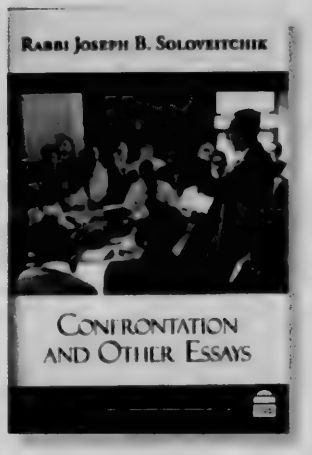
MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In his lifetime, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik (1903-1993) was the acknowledged leader of modern or "centrist" Orthodox Judaism in North America. Today, outside of haredi circles, almost all Orthodox leaders in North America (and a growing number in Israel) see themselves as his students or as the students of his students.

Among many of his rabbinical students, Rabbi Soloveitchik is best known for his accomplishments in the technical field of Talmud analysis. His philosophical thinking, though, attracted a wider audience. His essays on issues not related to Talmud, while few in number, continue to reverberate today. Five of his English-language essays from the 1960s and 1970s have recently been republished by Maggid Books, under the title Confrontation and Other Essays. (Neither the criteria for choosing these specific essays nor the identity of the person who made the choice is explained in the book.)

Confrontation, perhaps Rabbi Soloveitchik's most controversial essay, was written in 1964 while the Second Vatican Council was in session, a year before the publication of Nostra Aetate, the Catholic document that began the process of redefining the Church's attitude to Jews and Judaism. Some Jews at the time were trying to influence the outcome of the council. Rabbi Soloveitchik wrote explicitly that Jews should "refrain from suggesting to the community of the many [= Christians] ... changes in its ritual or emendations of its texts." He also spelled out what he saw as the appropriate limits to "dialogue" with Christians.

As the essay spoke only in general terms, in 1967 Rabbi Soloveitchik published an addendum (also reprinted in this book) to clarify that he opposed "any public debate, dialogue or symposium concerning the doctrinal, dogmatic or ritual aspects of our faith" with Christians. But, he wrote, "we are ready to enter into dialogue on such topics as war and peace [this during the worst of the war in Vietnam], poverty, freedom, man's moral values, the threat of secularism, technology and human values, civil rights etc., which revolve about religious spiritual aspects of our civilization."



Confrontation and other essays
Joseph B. Soloveitchik

Maggid Books

> Rabbi spelled out what he saw as the appropriate limits to 'dialogue' with Christians.

Despite his attempt to make his position crystal clear, his disciples still argue today about what he meant, often offering careful exegesis of this essay, as if it were a passage from the Talmud. Although it is debatable whether the relationship between Jews and Christians today is comparable to the situation 50 years ago, students of Rabbi Soloveitchik still ask: Did he oppose only public dialogue about articles of faith? When he admits that rabbis and Christian clergy who legitimately discuss moral problems do not discuss them "as sociologists, historians or cultural ethicists in agnostic or secular categories" but bring their religious "thoughts, feelings, perceptions and terminology" to the discussion, was he thus opening the door to very wide forms of dialogue?

While Confrontation is important as a historic document, all of these essays illuminate the thought of one of the most brilliant rabbis of modern times. Rabbi Soloveitchik's secular erudition (he earned a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Berlin just before moving to the United States in 1932) can be seen on almost every page.

As he was a keen student of the human condition, his words spoke even to Jews who lacked deep faith. He did not feel that the purpose of the Jewish religion was to make us feel more at ease. Judaism, in his understanding, forces us to confront the tensions or dialectic (a favourite word of his) involved in being a human being:

"Man is a dialectical being: an inner schism runs through his personality at every level. . . the Judaic view posits that this schism is willed by God as the source of man's greatness and election as a singular charismatic being. Man is a great and creative being because he is torn by conflict. . . The fact that the creative gesture is associated with agony is a result of this contradiction, which pervades the whole personality of man."

The essays explore a number of the tensions in the human condition, including whether we should identify as community members or as individuals and whether we are primarily citizens of the world or members of a particularistic people. Rabbi Soloveitchik contrasts the Jewish approach with that of Hegel, who also speaks in terms of opposites which he labels thesis and antithesis. While Hegel claims that thesis and antithesis have to be resolved in a synthesis, Rabbi Soloveitchik teaches that in Judaism, synthesis is neither desirable nor possible.

"Man is, quite often, a captive of two enchanting visions, summoning him to move in opposite directions. . . Man must decide which alternative to take . . . The clash is staggering . . . The Halachah is concerned with this dilemma and tries to help man in such critical moments. The Halachah, of course, did not discover the synthesis, since the latter does not exist. It did, however, find a way to enable man to respond to both calls."

Rabbi Soloveitchik's essays have an uplifting poetic quality. While they were written a generation or more ago, they deal with timeless questions. Sadly, since Rabbi Soloveitchik's death, no other thinker has combined his level of deep talmudic learning with a mastery of contemporary philosophical literature and sensitivity to the difficulties of the human condition. Republishing these essays now makes sense, both for those of us who have read them before and, hopefully, for a new questioning generation. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

A taste of empty nest syndrome

Lauren Kramer

"We will not have you treating this house like a hotel," my mother informed me sternly. I was 17 or 18 years old at the time and filled with the wanderlust that comes with new independence. My diary was jam packed with social activities – people I needed to see, gossip to be exchanged, boys to be admired and parties to attend. Home was a convenient place to take a shower, get some rest and have a good meal.

But the last thing I wanted was to share a cup of tea with my parents, exchange news or find out what was troubling them. I remember scoffing haughtily at the very idea that I considered our house a hotel. My mother's suggestion that I spend more time at home seemed so demanding, so unrealistic. I was young and deeply engaged with youth. Home was just a place to recharge my batteries before heading out into the world again.

I'm older now, and in my parents' shoes as I watch my home become a hotel for my son. Almost 16, he's fiercely independent, a social organizer who gathers people around him and arranges fun activities when he's not studying for school, training for a bike race or working his weekend job at the fish and chips restaurant down the road. As we witness the pace of his schedule accelerate each weekend, my husband and I look at each other in disbelief.

"We never get to see you anymore," we lament with more than a hint of Jewish guilt. "When will you have time for us?"

It's weird to hear my parents' words come so easily from my own mouth.

For sure, we're intensely proud of him. Somehow – and we don't know what we did right – we raised a kid who is ready to take on the world. Full of adventure, fun and street-smarts, our son is confident, charismatic and engaging. He's the kid who willingly vacates a seat on the subway for a senior, who helps mothers carry their strollers down the stairs. He's doing just what he's supposed to be doing, and though he's a few years away from moving out, our nest has begun to empty as his independence gathers momentum.

> You're never prepared for the emotional fallout of watching them spread their wings and leave the nest.

Intellectually, we knew it would happen. We just didn't know the moment would come so quickly, and that we'd feel so bereft when it arrived.

We're deeply ambivalent about the hole left by his diminishing physical presence in the house. The only sacred evening when we know for sure he'll be with us is Friday night's Shabbat dinner, but it's no longer safe to assume he'll join us on a Sunday family hike or a Saturday night dinner at friends' homes. His time is his own now, his schedule is packed from dawn to midnight, and even when he's home, his attention is diverted to a screen where the socializing continues in textual form.

The transition from boy to adult happened overnight it seems, and though his siblings occupy a good chunk of our time and attention, we didn't know how much we'd miss this young man's constant presence, or the sadness that would tug at our insides when he'd choose his friends' company over ours.

We know this is how it's meant to be. You raise 'em, you try to instil strong values and then you let 'em fly, hoping, praying they won't crash. Still, you're never prepared for the emotional fallout of watching them spread their wings and leave the nest.

University is two years away, so there's still time to get used to the idea that his days in the family home are numbered. But how it aches to see those wings practise for flight. When the time comes, I'll be sobbing in the corner, mighty proud, but missing him with a longing I could never have imagined. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski reflects on the laws of shmittah and the idea that rest breeds productivity
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen chronicles the origin of Lag b'Omer and the life of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

On Lag b'Omer we celebrate the life of Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, the second century sage and mystic.

The Talmud relates that Rabbi Shimon spoke out against the Roman authorities, and, after fleeing imprisonment, he and his son spent 12 years in a cave learning Torah.

When they emerged, the Talmud describes that their gaze would incinerate any object they saw. The spiritual heights they attained in the cave were incompatible with the physical world around them. They criticized the people for engaging in life's necessities, like planting, instead of eternal pursuits such as Torah study.

Unable to interact with the real world and with real people, they were sent back to the cave for another year.

When they emerged a second time, they engaged with an old man whom they saw holding two bundles of myrtle and running at twilight. The man explained that the branches are to perform the Torah's two Shabbat-related mitzvot: remember (zachor) and observe (shamor).

The man took something beautiful, lush and aromatic, and used it for something sacred. No longer critical of others, the father and son actually praise this man for loving the mitzvot.

Spending such intense uninterrupted quality time with our children engaged only in lofty pursuits, as Rabbi Shimon and his son did, may seem almost idyllic. The ability to immerse oneself in Torah in an interruption-free cave is not a surprising feat. There were no errands to run, meals to cook or bills to pay. This does not reflect the real world.

After all those years of study, one interaction with an old man teaches them how to find balance. This interaction teaches the very spiritual men that the physical world must play a part in a spiritual reality. It can actually bring love and beauty to the tradition.

As Jews, we study in order to engage with the world and learn from others. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

In this parshah, we have the rules for leaving the land fallow on the shmittah, the sabbatical year. We know that, agriculturally, land requires time to be left fallow in order to maintain good soil quality. But there are ways the agricultural can give rise to the cultural. Many of us consider the idea of shmittah metaphorically for what it can teach us about rest and renewal. Shabbat is our time for rest. Shmittah is the Shabbat for the earth.

We live in an age where there's a lot of talk of mindfulness, of living in the present moment. And yet we simultaneously live with the expectations of being able to multitask, of being constantly accessible, and of being able to manage our many roles seamlessly. We are overworked, overcommitted and overwhelmed. Devices meant to make our lives easier often make us feel that we can never take a break. They are there to enable us to be "connected," and yet I believe there has never been a time in history when people feel less connected to their families and communities.

Shmittah literally means release. What if we released ourselves from some fear, guilt and obligation? What if we asked ourselves what can I let go of? Fields that give us food and sustenance, if overworked and overwrought, will stop producing. And we are the same. If we are overworked and overwhelmed, then we will be unable to be fully available to those we love.

We, too, have a limit. And in this culture that measures goodness by productivity, it's good to remind ourselves that rest breeds productivity. Just like the harvest will be better if we rotate our crops and let the land rest, we will be better if we have a chance to rest and recuperate as well. ■

Lag b'Omer, the 33rd day of the Omer, is a very joyous day. On it, the students of the great Rabbi Akiva stopped dying from a unique plague because they did not respect each other.

It's also the yahrzeit of the great Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, a student of Rabbi Akiva.

In accordance with his express wishes, we mark the day as an occasion of great joy, in celebration of his life. Throughout the night and day, thousands of three-year-old boys, Ashkenazim and Sephardim alike, get their first haircut near his resting place. Enormous bonfires are lit, with singing the entire night. It's a wonderful sight to behold.

The Talmud relates that for 13 years, Rabbi Shimon hid in a cave fearing Roman persecution. By the grace of God, we live in a land where no one has to hide in a cave in order to observe Judaism and spread it to fellow Jews.

I will never forget the Lag b'Omer parades in New York, when Jews of all types came together in Jewish unity. The Lubavitcher Rebbe had much naches as the Hebrew schools all passed by with their mitzvah floats.

One boy was acting the part of saying the Shema dressed in his pyjamas. The Rebbe asked, "Where is his pillow?" The Rebbe was concerned with every detail.

So whether you're in Meron or Toronto, take your family for an outing with some roasted marshmallows and sing a song of Jewish pride!

We also read the parshah of Behar on Shabbat. The Torah was given on Sinai because it was a low mountain. But why not give the Torah in a valley, to teach us to be more humble? The answer is that one also needs to be proud when doing mitzvot and be firm like a mountain when facing obstacles. Am Yisrael Chai! ■

New takes on Jewish classics

dkoren@thecjn.ca

As any kosher foodie will tell you, Toronto's kosher food scene has been on the rise of late. In fact, for enthusiasts of kosher food who prefer to dine out, this month marks Kosher Restaurant Month throughout the city, with 23 eateries participating by offering patrons a 10 per cent discount.

But what about a culinary experience that isn't necessarily kosher, but still has Jewish roots? Where would culturally Jewish Torontonians go for some culinary classics that feel close to home?

Well, there are actually several options.

If you're in Thornhill, Centre Street Deli is great for classic deli fare, while Meron To Go is the place for Israeli staples, and What A Bagel offers kosher-style breakfast and brunch.

In the downtown core, some chefs offer slightly modified versions of the Jewish classics they grew up with, were influenced by, or both.

At Rione XI on St. Clair West, chefs Danilo and Sandrelle Scimo serve food inspired by Rome's historic Jewish quarter. Here you'll find authentic Italian dishes one wouldn't normally consider Jewish: wood fire-baked pizza, cornish hen, and carbonara that uses bresaola (air-dried salted beef) instead of pancetta (Italian bacon). Many of the pizzas also don't mix meat and cheese. The restaurant also pays tribute to Rome's Jewish quarter with two murals painted on its walls: one of the Great Synagogue of Rome, the other a map of the Jewish quarter.

If you head south and then east on Dupont Street, you'll eventually run into two of three Jewish-themed eateries within one kilometre of each other, all owned and operated by chef Anthony Rose: Schmaltz Appetizing (purveyors of fine fish), Fat Pasha (Rose's take on Israeli and Middle Eastern fare) and his flagship restaurant Rose & Sons (gluttonous Jewish-inspired brunch). At any of these spots you'll find new takes on Jewish or Israeli classics you grew up with. The Chubb Chubb sandwich at Schmaltz, for example, is Rose's take on lox and cream cheese, and features smoked whitefish salad, gravlax, horseradish cream cheese and dill cucumbers.

Rose also serves a sandwich called Farshtunken, which in Yiddish means "stinky." The sandwich consists of three types of herring, raw red onion, and a well-buttered bagel. It may live up to its name, but oy vey is it ever delicious.

At Caplansky's Deli on College Street, celebrity chef Zane Caplansky offers an entire menu's worth of his takes on classic Jewish delicatessen, from the Leaning Tower of Caplansky (thick-cut challah french toast with layers of cream cheese, blueberry jam and beef bacon) to the smoked meat knish pocket. There's also a latke poutine and a drink called the Jewmosa. While none of it is kosher, it's all deeply rooted in Jewish cuisine, Caplansky says. Furthermore, the restaurant's walls are clad with Jewish paraphernalia. Employees even wear shirts that read, "Kickin' it Old Shul."

Only a few minutes away you'll find People's Eatery in Chinatown on Spadina Avenue. Known for merging diverse cuisines, it serves a latke topped with trout, sour cream and roe (fish eggs). At Free Times Cafe, a staple in Toronto's downtown Jewish community, there's a range of Jewish and Israeli items, from chicken shish kebobs to smoked salmon platters, but also Canadian classics like nachos, chicken fingers and pearneal bacon burgers. The result is a diverse crowd that appreciates good food, Jewish or not.

If you head further south, and are in the mood for brunch, Noah Goldberg, executive chef of Peter Pan Bistro on Queen Street West, makes a mean shakshuka made from in-house ingredients. Goldberg first tried shakshuka in Israel, adored it, and decided to make his version using cumin, coriander, spices, and a medley of tomatoes, roasted red peppers and onions. He also adds za'atar, a dollop of labneh (a strained yogurt cheese that's quite popular in Israel) and recommends adding sausage made of lamb, not pork.

Kosher-style sausage is much more popular now anyways, he says. ■

Rachel Frenkel: 'In a difficult world, we derive strength from whatever gives us strength'

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rachel Frenkel is the dean of students at Nishmat, the Jeanie Schottenstein Center for Advanced Torah Study for Women, and the director of Matan's Hilkhata Institute at Matan Women's Institute for Torah Studies.

The Jerusalem Post described Frenkel as "a symbol of the period of unprecedented social unity, prayer and faith, a period that carried on into the rocket-racked days of Operation Protective Edge," after her 16-year-old son Naftali was kidnapped and murdered along with two other teens, Eyal Yifrach and Gilad Shaar, in June 2014.

On May 17, Frenkel led a discussion at Beit Avraham Yoseph Toronto Congregation in Thornhill, organized by the BAYT Sisterhood and the Canadian Friends of Nishmat, about the loss of her son and how her life and the climate in Israel has changed since then.

Rachel Frenkel, the mother of Naftali who was murdered in 2014.

In the time since your son was murdered, you've been seen as a public figure, a national heroine, a strong female religious leader. Are you comfortable with these labels?

[Laughter] None of them. It's not that I'm shy or humble. I'm trying to stay away from labels and just do the things that we feel connected to and that are important to us both in the field of Torah learning and involvement of women in Torah and in this thing that I've been thrown into – reluctantly is an understatement. I would not choose this for obvious reasons, but beyond the tragic side, and that never goes away, there was tremendous... it creates awe. You stand in front of the people and in a world where so many people are murdered all the time and nobody winks, here there were three kids who didn't come home from school and millions of Jews around the world lost sleep over it. It is almost miraculous, and we felt so grateful for the support and everything that was going on at every stage – if it was prayers, if it was rallies, if it was memorials – the whole idea that the whole Jewish world stood together like that, it speaks volumes about who we are and who we could strive to be. My role in this is really minor. It is the people that presented themselves.

I can say this about Israelis, and I know it is partially true also about Jews around the world: when Jews remember it, they remember the tragedy, but they also like who they were at the time. Something about our self-image. We showed our best at that time, and the ability of different segments of the Jewish world to stand together, to pray together, to connect, it can't be taken for granted.

You are often widely praised for your grace and composure, and I think it comforted a lot of people. From where did you pull your strength at that time?

I don't feel comfortable with that description. We dealt with things very intuitively as things came, and sometimes I feel like saying with so much support, zeh lo chochmah (it's not hard).

In a difficult world, we derive strength from whatever gives us strength, and if I have a share in that, it is a blessing, and I take no credit for that. We all play our roles in trying to do more good in the world.

I don't know, I might be embarrassed, I don't have an objective view, and I don't think anything we did was extraordinary. That is why I'm uncomfortable.

> In a world where so many people are murdered all the time and nobody winks, here there were three kids who didn't come home from school and millions of Jews around the world lost sleep over it.

During that time Israelis and Jews in the Diaspora were praying and grieving together, but do you feel that Jews living abroad can even truly feel one with Israel in these circumstances?

In Israel, they say we are very good in emergency situations, but in day-to-day life, we're not so nice to each other. Of course, I wish our everyday experience would be much more solidarity, etc., etc., but the mere fact that we are capable of being there is part of our identity. I think it is something to aspire to and build towards. We don't always have to be at the peak, as long as we are in the right direction.

Have there been any long-lasting effects?

That's a difficult question. I remember after that summer, a few weeks after it was all over, there were two images I was playing with. One was of a person walking in the dark and they are stumbling and can't find their way, and then there is lightning, which shows the reality that surrounds them and the lightning goes away and it is dark again and they are stumbling again but they have some inner knowledge of where they're at. It's truth, it is not an illusion.

And then on the other hand, when I was asking myself, "Will any of this last?" I was given the metaphor of a person that experienced love. And that couple might have not worked out eventually, but it's a life-transforming experience.

Hopefully, some things did stay with us. And sometimes the memory of that story, of that summer, evokes or awakens that place in us. There are no one-summer solutions to anything. In Israel, a few months later, we were in the middle of an election period and it was back to normal.

In your role as an educator, with women in particular, there are some people who see you as a feminist in the Orthodox world. Do you consider yourself to be a feminist?

I'm sure everything we are enjoying today in the development of Torah by women is directly related to the feminist movement – not the movement, but the changing role women are taking in the world in general. On my side, it would be an ingratitude to badmouth feminism in any way, because I think women all over the Jewish world, especially the ones taking their place in learning, in religious commitment, in religious involvement – and I'm talking in the Orthodox world at the moment – they are all gaining from the changes in women's standing in the last 100 years or so. The way the question is presented, it's as if it is a bad word. I don't have a problem with the word, and I'm thankful to think that it enabled so much for us.

My major motivation is not a gender motivation, but a Torah motivation. I seek Torah because this is what I wish for. This is what I want to develop. This is where my religious life wants to grow. It is not the gender agenda pushing this, but definitely, it has enabled a lot of what has happened. The motivation is a love of Torah. It is a religious motivation. It is wanting to grow to the highest levels within Jewish life, and Jewish life was always connected to learning. If you don't learn, you don't experience the religious value of Torah life. ■

A near-death experience

Backstory

ELI HONIG

As an infant, hidden in occupied France during the Holocaust, whose father and father's family perished in Auschwitz, I grew up with a haunting legacy. Over the years I wrestled with many aspects of this history.

My mother was five months pregnant with me, and she was left with her two little girls, when my father was arrested in the first nationwide roundup of Jews in France, on July 16, 1942. When I was much older, she told me that once, prior to his arrest, she had removed her yellow star and travelled to Paris from the town of Château Gontier where our family was in enforced residence. When she arrived she was caught in large police dragnet of prostitutes and placed in a jail cell with them. Three days later, she was released and returned home.

Late in my mother's pregnancy, two SS or Gestapo officers came by car to the small town to arrest her and her two girls. In a last act of desperation she blurted out that she was about to give birth. Since she was very heavy with child, and since the officers realized what a childbirth would do to their Mercedes, they retreated, saying that they would return. Through the remarkable mind numbing efforts of the extended Christian Counord-Gardon family, they failed in their mission. I was born, and they placed us in different hiding places for the duration of the war.

The Germans, realizing that their "prey" had eluded them, started hunting for us. They even interviewed my midwife who told them that Mme. Honig was so desperate that she probably jumped into the nearby Mayenne River with her children. When in 1980 I visited the people who had risked life, limb and torture to save us, I was told that the Germans dredged the river for three days in search of bodies - thereby allowing for more time to execute our escape.

I have in my possession a copy of a letter from the chief of the French police in Château Gontier to the commissioner of police for the province of Mayenne, stating that Mme. Esther Honig disappeared with her three children (names, and places and dates of birth included), and that he had no idea which direction she took. But he assured his superior that as soon as he found the whereabouts of the "fugitives" he would let him know. The letter was dated Nov. 24, 1942. So my mother was labelled a fugitive, and by extension I was too, at the age of three weeks.

> For almost two years we all had near-death experiences, though only my mother was aware of the true danger at the time.

When I was 50 years old I visited my mother in Montreal, and together we watched a video of the Holocaust interview that she had at the Living Testimonies Project at McGill University. There and then I finally learned the reason for her surreptitious nighttime trip to Paris where she was arrested and eventually released. She was going to an underground clinic to have an abortion! When she stepped out of the jail, she didn't know where to go. One direction led to the clinic and the other direction led to home. Then she saw a German soldier across the street and she said to herself that what she could do with two children, she could do with three. And she left for home - and I was born.

The revelation that I was almost aborted made me reel. But it was my mother's courage, and the realization that I ended up being the vehicle for the saving of my mother and my two sisters, not to speak of me, that has haunted me for years. Now I realize that for almost two years we all had near-death experiences, though only my mother was aware of the true danger at the time. As an infant, I could have no understanding of what transpired then. Yet it was surely the near-death experiences that have shadowed me in my cognitive years. ■

Eli Honig taught physics at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for 31 years, and for longer than that at the University of Toronto.

CLE Seminar

Charles Wagner

Chair, Trusts & Estates

On June 21, 2016 the Bnai Brith Trusts and Estates group is presenting its annual CLE seminars for lawyers and accountants. The format is a moot court which allows the presenters to educate attendees in an interesting way. This year's seminar deals with a wealthy widow who marries a younger man. Her children insist that their mother signs a prenuptial agreement. The mother and her fiancé comply. But when the mother dies her surviving husband cries foul and wants to set aside the agreement. The validity of that agreement is the main issue, but there are very important additional legal issues that are addressed by the seminar.

Another issue is the ethical obligation of the son who was a lawyer. He knew that his mother was purposefully hiding her assets. Is that ethical? If not what are the consequences of a lawyer conspiring with a client to hide assets? In this case scenario the Widow had two children – a son and a daughter. It may be that if the lawyer was negligent the surviving spouse will win, resulting in a sizeable reduction in the inheritance received by him and his sister. A court could hold him liable to his sister if in the end the will is set aside and the surviving husband inherits under the law of intestacy or is allowed to make a claim for equalization under the Family Law Act.

Arieh Bloom
Whaley Estate Litigation

The Widow's son, played by Arieh Bloom of Whaley Estate Litigation, was the lawyer who drafted the agreement and took his mother on as a client. In this scenario, the son provided independent legal advice to his mother. He knew that his mother purposely failed to make full and frank disclosure to her fiancé about the extent of her wealth. The Family Law Act provides that a court may set aside a domestic contract or a provision in it, if a party failed to disclose to the other significant assets. Attendees will learn under what circumstances a court may exercise its jurisdiction to set aside such agreements.

Greg Sidlofsky
Wagner Sidlofsky LLP

What will make this part of the presentation especially interesting is that the lawyer examining the son in chief is Jordan Oelbaum of Schnurr Kirsh Schnurr Oelbaum Tator LLP . Jordan regularly represents lawyers accused of negligence. Cross examining the alleged negligent lawyer will be my partner Gregory M. Sidlofsky of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP who is s an experienced litigation lawyer certified by the Law Society of Upper Canada as a Specialist in Civil Litigation. Greg and I have experience suing lawyers. It will be an exciting part of the presentation seeing these two square off.

The event will take place on June 21, 2016, at Shaarei Shomayim-Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8, and is open to lawyers and accountants. Please contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca.
